Mr. PITTMAN. As I say, I do not believe the delegation of authority was constitutional, but I am not arguing that question. There are others who can argue it more ably than I. However, I contend that no matter what the delegation is, the President may not make such a contract with a foreign government reducing for a period of time our revenue rates, except by a treaty. I understand that the President may make certain agreements and have understandings, which are not treaties, in respect to foreign relations.

I wish to consider the cases cited by Dr. Sayre, a distinguished professor of law. These cases were cited at the hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means, in an attempt to show that this kind of an agreement, which may be made by the President, has been approved in other cases. If that distinguished lawyer could have found stronger cases than these, I think he would have found them.

Let us consider the first case. The first case is the case of Field against Clark. What was that case? That case was brought by three or four persons attacking the constitutionality of the McKinley Tariff Act of 1890. They raised a number of grounds. They wanted to obtain the lower rates under the prior act, and they attacked the McKinley Act as unconstitutional. On what ground? In the first place, they attacked it on the ground that the act was not the measure which had passed the Senate. They tried to go behind the act and show what had happened in the Senate. The Supreme Court said, "You may not go behind the act."

The sugar schedule was also attacked as unconstitutional. Another thing which was attacked was the delegation of legislative and treaty-making power in the act. What the Court said was very interesting:

> The plaintiffs in error contend that this section, so far as it authorizes the President to suspend the provisions of the act relating to the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, is unconstitutional, as delegating to him both legislative and treaty-making powers, and, being an essential part of the system established by Congress, the entire act must be declared null and void. On behalf of the United States it is insisted that legislation of this character is sustained by an early decision of this court and by the practice of the Government for nearly a century.

The main fight was on the question whether or not the delegation of authority was constitutional. There was nothing about treaties in the act. The appellants contended that the act was an unconstitutional delegation of legislative and treaty-making power. The Court said:

> To what extent do precedents in legislation sustain the validity of the section under consideration, so far as it makes the suspension of certain provisions and the going into operation of other provisions of an act of Congress depend upon the action of the President based upon the occurrence of subsequent events, or the ascertainment by him of certain facts, to be made known by his proclamation? If we find that Congress has frequently, from the organization of the Government to the present time, conferred upon the President powers, with reference to trade and commerce, like those conferred by the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, that fact is entitled to great weight in determining the question before us.

What power was delegated to the President under the act of 1890? The right to put either one of two acts into effect. The appellants said that such a delegation of power was unconstitutional. From the very beginning of our history, whenever Congress has laid down alternative standards one providing for free trade and the other for tariffs, and has allowed the President to put either one in effect upon the occurrence of certain conditions, such delegation of power has been upheld, of course. There is no question about it.

The Court went on to say:

> As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress.

There is no such situation here. We have not two acts of Congress; we have, in fact, no act at all. In this case there were certain goods on the free list and the President was authorized to put them on the dutiable list at certain rates specified if there was a discrimination against us by foreign countries.

What would the President do in that case? He would induce other countries to reduce some of their tariff rates under the threat that he would take certain commodities off the free list and put them on the dutiable list; but he would enter into no agreement; there was no agreement at all. No agreement can be found in this instance. It simply says that, in view of the fact that the State of Brazil has reduced its tariff on certain commodities, the United States will allow certain commodities to remain on the free list. That is all that is stated.

But in this case, the court says:

> The court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President.

That is all; there is no mention of a treaty in that act. Of course, Mr. President, all that act did was to say to a foreign country, "Reduce your tariff on certain commodities or we will take certain articles off the free list and put them on the dutiable list." That was the only thing done.

What is the other case under the Dingley Tariff Act? The proponents of the measure talk about the Altman case.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Perhaps the Senator will not mind my suggesting that in that case the President did not fix the tariff rates, but the act itself prescribed the exact duties which should be in effect if the President made his finding?

Mr. PITTMAN. Exactly.

Mr. ADAMS. It was not left to him as to what the tariff rate should be.

Mr. PITTMAN. There was no discretion left at all. There were certain articles on the free list, such as sugar, for instance, and, of course, there was a dutiable list as to other articles and the law allowed the President to put into effect if he wanted to, the rates provided in the dutiable list on certain commodities in the event some other country was discriminating against us. That was all that was provided.

I should like to put into the RECORD at this point the reciprocal provision of the Tariff Act of 1890. I desire to put it into the RECORD because it governs the case which is cited to show that this act is constitutional. I read from section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1890:

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January 1892, whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the products of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country as follows, namely—

Each item is specified. As a matter of fact, the President did not put that provision into effect. He allowed these articles to remain on the free list in consideration of the other countries reducing some of their duties. I ask that the entire section 3 of the McKinley Tariff Act of 1890 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the section was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[U. S. Stat. L., ch. 1244, 1890; McKinley Tariff Act of 1890]

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January 1892 whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country as follows, namely:

All sugars not above No. 13 Dutch standard in color shall pay duty on their polariscopic tests as follows, namely:

All sugars not above No. 13 Dutch standard in color, all tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice or of beet juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75°, seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound; and for every additional degree or fraction of a degree shown by the polariscopic test, two-hundredths of 1 cent per pound additional.

All sugar above No. 16 and not above No. 20 Dutch standard of color, 1⅝ cents per pound.

All sugars above No. 20 Dutch standard of color, 2 cents per pound.

Molasses testing above 56°, 4 cents per gallon.

Sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty either as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test.

On coffee, 3 cents per pound.

On tea, 10 cents per pound.

Hides, raw or uncured, whether dry, salted, or pickled, Angora goat skins, raw, without the wool, unmanufactured, asses' skins, raw or unmanufactured, and skins, except sheep skins, with the wool on, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. PITTMAN. Now I invite the Senate to listen to the Altman case, which is the prize case of those who contend that when the Court stated that certain agreements were not treaties it absolutely proved that the agreements under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act are not treaties.

The decision referred to was rendered under the Dingley Tariff Act. The Dingley Act, of course, was a long act, but I will read the reciprocal provision of that act. I have already given the Senate the reciprocal provision of the 1890 act, and in the Dingley Act there was practically the same provision:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries—the following articles: Argols or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies * * *, champagne * * *, still wines, and vermouth; paintings and statuary.

And so forth—

Under the act the President could reduce the tariffs on those commodities, if he wanted to, by putting into effect the rates provided under section 3 of the act. The regular rate under the Dingley tariff was 45 percent. It was provided that if certain governments made concessions to us with regard to our exports the President might impose a lower duty, down to 15 percent.

This is what the suit arose over. In the reciprocity provision of the Dingley Act it was provided that the rate on paintings in oils or water colors, pastels, pen-and-ink drawings, and statuary should be 15 percent ad valorem.

That was the rate to which the tariff might be reduced. Altman & Co. imported a piece of molded statuary from France.

The Government of France had entered into an agreement with President McKinley under the reciprocal provision of the Dingley Tariff Act. In other words, France obtained a reduction of tariff duties on brandies, statuary, and other commodities mentioned, and President McKinley proclaimed the rate under which those commodities should be allowed to come into this country. This is what the President did, and it is all he did—and I am getting down to the Altman case—the President issued a proclamation, saying:

Whereas, pursuant to section 3 of the act of Congress approved July 24, 1897, entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," the Governments of the United States and of the French Republic have in the spirit of amity, and with a desire to improve their commercial relations, entered into a commercial agreement in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions have been in the judgment of the President secured according to the provisions of said section, whereby the following articles of commerce, being the products and manufactures of the United States, are to be admitted into France on and after the 1st day of June 1898, at the minimum rate of duty, not exceeding the rates respectively appearing in the following table—

Then the articles bearing the lower rate are set forth in the table—

Therefore, in further execution of the provisions of said section, it is hereby declared that on and after the 1st day of June 1898, and during the continuance in force of the agreement aforesaid, and until otherwise declared, the imposition and collection of the duties heretofore imposed and collected upon the following-named articles, the products of France, by virtue of said act, are hereby suspended, and in place thereof the duties shall be imposed and collected thereon according to the provisions of said section 3, as follows:

Then the articles on which the lower rate of duty is to be imposed are enumerated, after which the proclamation proceeds:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, William McKinley, President of the United States of America, have caused the above-stated modifications of the customs duties of the respective countries to be made public for the information of the citizens of the United States of America.

Mr. President, let me now call attention to the fact that that was the only agreement with France; that was all of it. France simply notified President McKinley that it had reduced French tariff duties on certain articles, whereupon the President declared that the lower rates of the American tariff should go into effect on certain French articles.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. Do I understand that the cases which are relied on to which the Senator has adverted are instances in which the Congress has authorized the President to make shifts in the tariff rates only in definitely specified categories?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. And with a strict limitation on his power to make changes only in those definite categories?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. In other words, it was to some degree, then, a unilateral operation?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; it was.

I will state that the opinion in the Altman case deals very largely with the delegation of legislative authority. The question of treaties came into this matter in only one way. Under the Circuit Court of Appeals Act of 1891, an appeal might be taken from the circuit court directly to the Supreme Court in cases affecting revenues and cases involving the construction of a statute or a treaty. That was what was provided in the act. The Court, in its opinion in the Altman case, held that it was undoubtedly the intention of Congress to allow all kinds of compacts and agreements and treaties entered into between our Government and some foreign government to come up to the Supreme Court for construction. It was impossible to tell whether or not the instrument in question was a treaty until it got there; and the Court held that in passing the Circuit Court of Appeals Act, which stated that there might be a direct appeal from the construction of a treaty to the Supreme Court, Congress evidently did not intend a narrow construction of the Constitution in relation to a treaty but meant any agreement entered into by our Government and a foreign government; and the Court held that the proclamation of the President was an agreement but not a treaty. It was not a treaty because it was not binding for any definite time. It lasted only so long as either government wanted it to last and no longer. The proclamation itself stated that it should last only so long as it was not changed. There was no contract whatever. It was simply an arrangement that the President had with France that France would reduce its tariff on certain articles and the President would reduce the American tariff on certain articles; but here is the part that is pertinent to this case. The Court says in its opinion:

> The bust was imported from France and was assessed a duty of 45 percent ad valorem under paragraph 193 of the Tariff Act of 1897 (30 Stat. 151, 167), which covers articles or wares, not specially provided for in the act, composed wholly or in part of metal, and whether partly or wholly manufactured. A protest was filed by the importers in which they contended that the bust should be classed as statuary—> under the commercial reciprocal agreement with France (30 Stat. 1774), which was negotiated under the authority contained in section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897, to make reciprocal agreements with reference, among other articles, to "paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen and ink drawings, and statuary."

Statuary was one of the articles on which the duty could be reduced.

This is what the appellants contended in that matter: It was contended that the lower court erred—

> In not holding that the commercial agreement between the United States and France, as proclaimed by the President of the United States (T. D. 19405 and 30 Stat. 1774), was to be in full scope according to its language without being in any way restricted or modified by the definition contained in paragraph 454, section 1, of the Tariff Act of July 24, 1897, but which definition was not embodied either in the commercial agreement itself or in the President's proclamation thereof.

What did the court hold? It held that the statute governed; that the so-called agreement was nothing but a method of executing the statute; and that while the agreement merely used the word "statuary," the act itself defined what "statuary" was. It has to be a work of art, and not a molding.

Let me read the last part of the opinion. Let us be frank, and see what the court had to say about this agreement:

> While it may be true that this commercial agreement, made under authority of the Tariff Act of 1897, section 3, was not a treaty possessing the dignity of one requiring ratification by the Senate of the United States, it was an international compact, negotiated between the representatives of two sovereign nations and made in the name and on behalf of the contracting countries, and dealing with important commercial relations between the two countries, and was proclaimed by the President. If not technically a treaty requiring ratification, nevertheless it was a compact authorized by the Congress of the United States, negotiated and proclaimed under the authority of its President. We think such a compact is a treaty under the Circuit Court of Appeals Act, and where its construction is directly involved, as it is here, there is a right of review by direct appeal to this Court.

That is the way the case got there, but this is the opinion of the Court in that case, in which the Court said that the so-called agreement was not binding because it was simply a device to carry out an act which was on the statute books, and I will read it to you.

> The negotiation was entered into between the representatives of the two countries under the authority of section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897, as we have seen. In that act the term "statuary" is defined as follows: "The term 'statuary' as used in this act shall be understood to include only such statuary as is cut, carved, or otherwise wrought by hand from a solid block or mass of marble, stone, or alabaster, or from metal, and as is the professional production of a statuary or sculptor only." The reciprocal agreements were authorized with reference to "paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen-and-ink drawings, and statuary." We think this must have reference to statuary as already defined in the act, which both parties understood was the source of their authority to negotiate the reciprocal commercial agreement in question, for the agreement provides:
> "It is reciprocally agreed on the part of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the United States Tariff Act of 1897, that during the continuance in force of this agreement, the following articles of commerce, the product of the soil or industry of France, shall be admitted into the United States at rates of duty not exceeding the following, to wit:
> * * * * * * *
> "Paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen-and-ink drawings, and statuary, 15 percent ad valorem."
> Thus in its terms the agreement was made under the authority and in accordance with section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897, in which very act the term statuary, as used therein, was specifically defined, as we have already stated.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator is reading from the Altman case?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, from the Altman case.

Mr. ADAMS. As I understand, the case deals with two definitions. One is the term "treaty" as used in the Circuit Court of Appeals Act. The other is the term "statuary" as used in the Tariff Act.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. I was hoping that the Senator would point out what is contained in section 4 of the act with which he is dealing.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will.

Mr. ADAMS. Section 4 of the act, which gives a general right for reciprocity negotiations, specifically compels that they be referred back not only to the Senate but to the Congress for ratification.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will discuss that in a few minutes. I thank the Senator. I will read the closing language of the opinion:

> We think that it is clear that the Board of General Appraisers and the circuit court did not err in finding that this bronze statue was not wrought by hand from metal. On the other hand, the testimony is clear that the statue was cast from metal by artisans employed for that purpose, and was very little touched, if at all, in its finishing, by the professional designer.

In that case, to which the Senator has called attention, the only attempted interpretation of the word "treaty" was in connection with the Circuit Court of Appeals Act of 1891, which stated, among other things, that there might be a direct appeal from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court in the construction of constitutional questions with regard to statutes or treaties, and that while the language in the Circuit Court of Appeals Act said "treaties" the court thought the intent of Congress in allowing them to investigate these instruments to see whether or not they were treaties was to allow them to take in any agreement or compact or treaty between our Government and a foreign government, and therefore they took jurisdiction of the case; but no question of a treaty was involved. The proponents of this measure have admitted that an agreement and a treaty are two different things or just the same thing; I do not know which they admit.

Now, let me take up this act. I have read a part of the Dingley Act. I desire to call attention to something very peculiar about this matter. I said a while ago that no Congress from the beginning of our Government had ever attempted to delegate such authority as is delegated in this instance. I have already gone through the statutes down to 1890, and all the President was allowed to do in the statute of 1890 was to raise the duty on some free-list articles to a specified rate.

The Dingley Act, in section 3, dealt with the specific articles about which I have told the Senate, and all the President had to do was to proclaim what they were. He proclaimed them, and that was the end of it. Remember that section 3 of the Dingley Act dealt with certain specific articles which were on a certain dutiable list but which the President had a right to put on another dutiable list; and the duties in each list were set out in the statute. But now I shall read section 4. This is what Congress thought about agreements of this kind:

SEC. 4. That whenever the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with foreign countries, shall, within the period of 2 years from and after the passage of this act, enter into commercial treaty or treaties with any other country or countries concerning the admission into any such country or countries of the goods, wares, and merchandise of the United States and their use and disposition therein, deemed to be for the interests of the United States, and in such treaty or treaties, in consideration of the advantages accruing to the United States therefrom, shall provide for the reduction during a specified period, not exceeding 5 years, of the duties imposed by this act, to the extent of not more than 20 percent thereof, upon such goods, wares, or merchandise, as may be designated therein of the country or countries with which such treaty or treaties shall be made as in this section provided for; or shall provide for the transfer during such period from the dutiable list of this act to the free list thereof of such goods, wares, and merchandise, being the natural products of such foreign country or countries and not of the United States; or shall provide for the retention upon the free list of this act during a specified period, not exceeding 5 years, of such goods, wares, and merchandise now included in said free list as may be designated therein; and when any such treaty shall have been duly ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress, and public proclamation made accordingly, then and thereafter the duties which shall be collected by the United States upon any of the designated goods, wares, and merchandise from the foreign country with which such treaty has been made shall, during the period provided for, be the duties specified and provided for in such treaty, and none other.

The Altman case was under section 3 of the Dingley Act, not under section 4. Section 3 prescribes certain acts by the President, leaving goods named on the one list, or putting them on another list with the duties named. But here the reference to agreements not ratified is to those made under section 4. Agreements were negotiated by the President under section 4, and those were the only important agreements negotiated. The few articles mentioned in section 3 did not amount to much. But in section 4, Congress expressly provided, with regard to general agreements such as are prescribed in this measure, for agreements with regard to other articles of import, which agreements not only must have been ratified by the Senate, but must have been approved by Congress.

Some complaint has been made with regard to the failure to ratify the treaties which were negotiated under section 4. Let us assume that the United States Senate did not approve them. Was it any crime that they should refuse to ratify them?

The distinguished Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Grady, when testifying before the House committee, made as his chief argument against the necessity of ratification of trade agreements by the Senate the statement that under section 4 of the Dingley Act such agreements were required to be ratified, but that they were not ratified by the Senate. I know there are governments far more expeditious than is the United States Government. Hitler's government is more expeditious than ours. Hitler can execute a man without indictment or trial. Hitler can place any tax upon his people he desires. His is an expeditious government, and there are other expeditious governments in Europe. But we do not want such expedition.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the agreements which were not ratified were all negotiated by a certain gentleman who was not in a high place, a man by the name of Kasson?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. Do the House hearings at any place disclose that these agreements should have been ratified?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I did not find any such evidence. I found that the Assistant Secretary was very much incensed at the great delay in passing the Tariff Act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I recall, the agreements were not even voted on. The Senate did not even vote to reject them. They were just not voted upon.

Mr. PITTMAN. They could not have been very desirable, or the President or someone else would have been urging that they be taken up. The chances are that they were so absurd that the President of the United States would not ask Congress to act on them. There is no history of them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is it not a fact that as soon as the contents of those treaties were made known to the public there was such a storm of indignation that the President declined to urge their ratification; and, of course, the Senate declined to take any action?

Mr. PITTMAN. The history of what happened was not disclosed by the Assistant Secretary before the committee. The whole complaint was that making treaties meant delay. I think there has been more damage done our Government by hasty action than ever was done by delay. Some are impatient now because we will not surrender the constitutional power of the United States Senate. That is the whole thing.

Perhaps we are wrong. Perhaps the President of the United States should be allowed to enter into any kind of contract with foreign governments without any review by the Congress of the United States. If that is the case, let us repeal the provision with reference to treaties in the regular way, but not attempt by subterfuge and circumlocution to repeal that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks, which are about to come to a close, the various reciprocal tariff acts, starting in 1890 with the McKinley law, so that the Senate can see that no treaty was required under any of them, except under section 4 of the Dingley Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the little agreements which were made for the purpose of putting into force one tariff or another were merely in the form of diplomatic correspondence which Presidents had, without being binding for a moment. None of those agreements was binding. An agreement made under the pending measure would be binding for 3 years.

We passed a flexible tariff act, but no foreign government helped us make it, and we are under no obligation to any foreign government not to repeal it or to amend it or to modify it any day when we get ready to do so.

By the proposed law we would be inviting foreign governments to enter into agreements with the President of the United States with regard to all kinds of matters. It would not make any difference whether it was a tariff matter or whether it was cultural or whether it was looking toward peace. We would be saying that we believed that this delegation to the President to make an agreement with a foreign government, which agreement would really be a law, without ratification of the Senate, would be constitutional.

If we once set that precedent, we will have a Congress which will relieve itself of responsibility in order to get expedition, which will be secured by turning over to the President power to enter into any kind of an agreement with a foreign country with regard to anything which he thinks will preserve the peace of this country.

I think that perhaps Congress would be more justified in authorizing the President of the United States to enter into agreements with foreign countries which, in his opinion, he believed would tend to maintain the peace of this country than in providing the authorization contemplated by the pending measure. But if we are to do it, we must recognize that he would have the right, in his discretion, if he proclaimed it in the interest of the peace of our Government, to put the United States into the League of Nations. Why should we delay on the floor of the Senate in considering a question of that kind, which the President might consider necessary in an emergency? It would be contended that we should act quickly. The President might favor adherence to the World Court as a means of protecting our country against war. Why not grant the power to him? Why take the time on the floor of the Senate to delay action of that kind? It might be a war emergency! Of course, such delegation would be unconstitutional.

Mr. President, I have not discussed this matter pro forma. I admit that I have made the argument somewhat wanderingly. But I am as intensely interested in this question as in any to which I have ever addressed myself. I believe that the enactment of this measure would be the first step toward abolishing the constitutional provision with regard to the ratification of treaties. I am sure of it.

Reference has been made to the case of United States against Curtiss-Wright. That case had nothing to do with treaties. The officers of the Curtiss-Wright Co. were indicted under a proclamation the President made under a statute prohibiting the export of arms and munitions to Bolivia and Paraguay.

After the President issued the proclamation the officers of the Curtiss-Wright Co. were indicted and convicted. There was not a word as to a treaty in the case, except in the long-winded opinion—and it was an excellent opinion, at that—in which the Court sustained the inherent power of the President in matters concerning relations between this Government and foreign governments, where not restricted by the Costitution.

In the case of United States against Belmont no question of a treaty was involved.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the power should be held to be inherent in the Executive, then the power must necessarily be all-inclusive.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no doubt from the argument made in the Belmont case, which is very clear and plain, that there are certain duties and obligations falling on sovereignty, that the sovereignty must communicate with other sovereignties in various ways. There was no question of treaties involved.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. To negotiate them.

Mr. PITTMAN. No one denies the power to negotiate treaties, have understandings, make agreements, but when it comes to making treaties, that is not an inherent power, because that has been limited by the Constitution.

I should like to read the Belmont case, but will not have time to do so. However, I wish to read the concurring opinion. I think the whole matter will be settled by reading the concurring opinion in the Belmont case. The concurring opinion was written by Mr. Justice Stone, concurred in by Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Cardozo.

Mr. President, in that case a corporation was organized in the United States, prior to 1918, under the laws of Russia. The corporation had a bank deposit in August Belmont's bank in New York. In 1918, when the Communists came into power, they declared the corporation dissolved and confiscated its property. Of course, it being a Russian corporation, the Communist government claimed the right to confiscate the corporation's money in the banks in New York. As a matter of fact, Americans owned the corporation and its funds. When we recognized the Soviet Republic in 1933, the Soviet Republic assigned to the President of the United States these accounts in the Belmont bank. They owned them because they had sequestered them, and they assigned them to the President of the United States. The President took them over. No treaty was involved. The President simply took over the funds.

I wish to read a few lines from the concurring opinion in that case:

> It is unnecessary to consider whether the present agreement between the two Governments can rightly be given the same effect as a treaty within this rule, for neither the allegations of the bill of complaint, nor the diplomatic exchanges, suggest that the United States has either recognized or declared that any State policy is to be overridden.
> So far as now relevant, the documents signed by the Soviet Government, as preparatory to a more general settlement of claims and counterclaims between the two Governments, assigns and releases to the United States all amounts "due or that may be found to be due it" from American nationals, and provides that the Soviet Government is "to be duly notified in each case of any amount realized by the Government of the United States from such release and assignment." The relevant portion of that document signed by the President is expressed in the following paragraph:
> "I am glad to have these undertakings by your Government, and I shall be pleased to notify your Government in each case of any amount realized by the Government of the United States from the release and assignment to it of the amounts admitted to be due or that may be found to be due."

Of course, that was not a treaty. Naturally it was not. There was assigned to the President in trust some money in a bank. The only condition of the trust was that the President was to notify the Soviet Government from time to time of collections. Not a single case is cited that is not exactly along the same line as the cases I have read. Yet those are the only cases that can be found by Dr. Sayre in support of his contention that agreements similar to the ones now to be authorized have been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. No case of that kind can be found. As a matter of fact, the distinction between informal communications between the President and foreign governments has emphasized the fact that trade agreements do constitute treaties. They provide for a period a years contracts for certain changes in our laws, and such contracts cannot be terminated morally or legally within 3 years.

It is strange that the United States, which has been an example of democracy for all American republics, which has taught them the safeguards that we have thrown around the citizen in our Constitution, and has induced them to adopt the same safeguards, should now desert those safeguards by enacting this legislation. But let me show that the little South American republics, to whom we have taught democracy, require ratification of these agreements. Consider this, for instance:

Agreements became effective provisionally subject to eventual legislative action in the foreign country, and such subsequent legislative action has been taken in all but three countries as noted below:

First. Canada—two agreements.

Second. Czechoslovakia—not ratified and ratification cannot now be expected.

Third. France—subsequent legislative action has not yet been taken, so agreement is in effect only provisionally.

Fourth. Netherlands.

Fifth. Switzerland.

Sixth. Turkey.

Seventh. United Kingdom.

Eighth. Venezuela—not yet ratified but ratification expected.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. Does not the Senator from Nevada find it to be ironical that a great, powerful Nation, whose avowed purpose is to bring about peace throughout the world, is one of the few, if not the only nation, which does not require ratification?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think it is strange. Let me proceed further.

Agreements did not become effective until they had received legislative approval in the foreign country, as listed below (such approval has been given by all the countries): (1) Brazil, (2) Colombia, (3) Costa Rica, (4) El Salvador, (5) Finland, (6) Guatemala, (7) Haiti, (8) Honduras, (9) Nicaragua, (10) Sweden.

We have taught democracy to those countries. We have taught them that there should be certain safeguards in their constitutions, so that neither the legislative nor the executive nor the judicial could deprive citizens of their rights. Two safeguards were put in the Constitution which we considered most important. One of them was that revenue bills had to originate in the House of Representatives, and the other was that the President of the United States could not enter into treaties with foreign governments save and except by the ratification of the United States Senate, two-thirds of those present concurring.

Mr. President, I think it is pitiful that the distinguished lawyer, the former Assistant Secretary of State, submitted these few cases as a justification of the agreements under this act. There can be no comparison whatever between those cases and the matter under consideration. In the cases cited the legislation provided for carrying out specific statutes. The President had nothing to do except to correspond, exchange letters, and issue a proclamation.

I say again that if under the definition of a treaty by the Supreme Court of the United States the agreements provided for under the pending measure are not treaties, then I cannot conceive of what would be treaties. They are certainly contracts; they are certainly for periods of time; they certainly affect the public welfare; and they cannot be changed morally within the period of 3 years.

Of course, I well know that a number of us Democrats favor lower tariffs; but we do not believe that all tariffs can be lowered without destruction of industry. There is no doubt that some tariffs are too high. There is no question that it is well to encourage trade between nations by removing or lowering trade restrictions. Yet never before in our history has any Congress ever attempted to turn over to a President the supreme powers provided in this legislation.

Mr. President, I wish to place in the RECORD the text of the Underwood Tariff Act at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SECTION IV

A. That for the purpose of readjusting the present duties on importations into the United States and at the same time to encourage the export trade of this country, the President of the United States is authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

B. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on the 11th day of December 1902, or the provisions of the act of Congress heretofore passed for the execution of the same except as to the proviso of article 8 of said treaty, which proviso is hereby abrogated and repealed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oscar Underwood was almost a free-trader. There is no doubt that he believed in the reduction of tariffs. But he was unwilling to trust even the President of the United States—President Wilson—whom he loved and admired, with the power to make tariff laws by agreement, because he provided that such an agreement should not become effective as law until approved by Congress. That was provided in the Underwood Act. But we are drifting away from that rapidly. We are doing away with our constitutional function, because it requires thought on our part, and because our system of government is too slow.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I respectfully wish to say to the Senator that he does not have to go back as far as the Underwood Act. Some of those who are concerned with the situation now felt a little differently awhile ago.

Mr. PITTMAN. I may say that I think the act has some great advantages.

I really think that by conference with foreign governments we can receive great aid in fixing the tariff; but I do not like the system of conferences we have with regard to these matters. A committee in the State Department, headed generally by an Assistant Secretary, with five or six subordinates under him, frames the tariffs. One has the right to appear before the committee if he sees fit to oppose any item. What is the result? He appears before four or five men who have no responsibility to any constituency or to the citizens of the United States. He makes his objections, and hears nothing. The committee sits and listens to him, and when he is through he has not the slightest idea whether the committee agrees with him or disagrees with him. I do not like that method of getting at the facts with regard to a tariff act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will yield in a moment.

However, if such an agreement came to the Senate for ratification it would be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and 23 men would sit and argue over every item in it. There would not be very many items. Such treaties usually contain only 6 or 7 items. They are not like tariff bills, which contain thousands of items and afford an opportunity for log-rolling. There would be only 6 or 7 items in such an agreement. The chances are that there would be very little opposition to any item, but if there were opposition we should have a very large committee—a cross-section of the whole United States—which probably would not be governed by any prejudice in the matter.

It is said that the treaties negotiated under section 4 of the Dingley Act were not ratified. Let us remember that conditions now are quite different from those which existed in 1897.

In 1897 the Republicans were for the highest protective tariff they could get—almost an exclusive protective tariff. On the other hand, I think the Democrats were largely free-traders. That situation does not exist today. There are now very few free-traders on the Democratic side; and I believe that today the number of extreme high protectionists is nothing like what it was in the days of 1897. Men's minds have come closer together on these subjects. We need not have the fear we then had. Of course, if there had been any violent reductions in the tariff in 1897, the make-up of the Senate at that time, which was largely Republican, would not have stood for such reductions.

I do not think we now have a situation of that kind. Each treaty involves a few articles with respect to different countries, and there would not be any mass opposition. There might be a few opposed to this item, or a few opposed to another item, but in the long run the treaties would be ratified if they were based upon common sense and reason; and if they were not based upon common sense and reason, expedition would not justify their ratification.

We are now looking to a President of the United States who favors the reduction of tariffs. Remember that the act sought to be extended allows the President to raise the tariff as well as to lower it. It allows him to place embargoes as well as to raise the tariff. Some of us are thinking of the present President. Unfortunately, a high-protective-tariff Republican might be elected at the next election. If so, what should we look for? Should we look for a reduction or should we look for an increase? Which do we want? The authority will last for 3 years.

Furthermore, today, when the world is torn apart, when no stable commercial or monetary systems exist in Europe, when exchange is fluctuating night by night, the futility of our Government at this time attempting to enter into 3-year contracts with any government in the world must be apparent.

I wrote to the Commission to find out whether or not, in fixing a tariff, they should take into consideration the exchange value of the money of the foreign country with which they were dealing. They admitted that the exchange value of money today has more influence upon the value of the tax than the cost of labor or anything else.

Perhaps, after the war—if it shall be fought to a conclusion—or after peace shall have been established in Europe, we can come back and, on the basis of the facts then existing, intelligently work out some kind of reciprocity treaty. Today we shall be making the greatest mistake of our lives if we authorize the President of the United States to make tariff acts for periods of 3 years by agreements with foreign governments, when even now they are repudiating the agreements they have already made. War necessity compels them to repudiate them.

If the Senate wants to abolish its constitutional privilege to ratify treaties, it can do so now. It has an opportunity to vote down my amendment; but I warn the Senate that the time may come when the precedent we thus establish may be used in a manner which we do not like, and then we shall regret it.

[Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, approved June 12, 1934]

That the President has authority "(2) to proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder."

All sugars above No. 13 Dutch standard in color shall be classified by the Dutch standard of color and pay duty as follows, namely:

All sugar above No. 13 and not above No. 16 Dutch standard of color, 1⅜ cents per pound.

[U. S. Stat. L., ch. 11, 1897; Dingley Tariff Act of 1897]

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies, producing and exporting to this country the following articles: Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies, or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials; champagne and all other sparkling wines; still wines, and vermouth; paintings and statuary; or any of them the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter, to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States; and whenever the government of any country, or colony, producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States, or make concessions in favor of the products, or manufactures thereof, which, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend, during the time of such agreement or concession, by proclamation to that effect, the imposition and collection of the duties mentioned in this act, on such article or articles so exported to the United States from such country or colony, and thereupon and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such article or articles shall be as follows, namely:

The President shall have power, and it shall be his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that any such agreement in this section mentioned is not being fully executed by the government with which it shall have been made, to revoke such suspension and notify such government thereof.

And it is further provided that with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country, or colony of such government, producing and exporting directly or indirectly to the United States coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States which, in view of the introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, into the United States, as in this act hereinbefore provided for, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, of the products of such country or colony, for such time as he shall deem just; and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, the products or exports, direct or indirect, from such designated country, as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after the 31st day of March, 1910 except as otherwise specially provided for in this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the rates of duty prescribed by the schedules and paragraphs of the dutiable list of section 1 of this act, and in addition thereto 25 percent ad valorem; which rates shall constitute the maximum tariff of the United States: Provided, That whenever, after the 31st day of March 1910, and so long thereafter as the President shall be satisfied, in view of the character of the concessions granted by the minimum tariff of the United States, that the government of any foreign country imposes no terms or restrictions, either in the way of tariff rates or provisions, trade or other regulations, charges, exactions, or in any other manner, directly or indirectly, upon the importation into or the sale in such foreign country of any agricultural, manufactured, or other product of the United States, which unduly discriminate against the United States, or the products thereof, and that such foreign country pays no export bounty or imposes no export duty or prohibition upon the exportation of any article to the United States which unduly discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and that such foreign country accords to the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States treatment which is reciprocal and equivalent, thereupon and thereafter, upon proclamation to this effect by the President of the United States, all articles when imported into the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), from such foreign country shall, except as otherwise herein provided, be admitted under the terms of the minimum tariff of the United States as prescribed by section 1 of this act. The proclamation issued by the President under the authority hereby conferred and the application of the minimum tariff thereupon may, in accordance with the facts as found by the President, extend to the whole of any foreign country, or may be confined to or exclude from its effect any dependency, colony, or other political subdivision having authority to adopt and enforce tariff legislation, or to impose restrictions or regulations, or to grant concessions upon the exportation or importation of articles which are, or may be, imported into the United States. Whenever the President shall be satisfied that the conditions which led to the issuance of the proclamation hereinbefore authorized no longer exist, he shall issue a proclamation to this effect, and 90 days thereafter the provisions of the maximum tariff shall be applied to the importation of articles from such country. Whenever the provisions of the maximum tariff of the United States shall be applicable to articles imported from any foreign country they shall be applicable to the products of such country, whether imported directly from the country of production or otherwise. SEC. 4. That the President shall have power and it shall be his duty to give notice, within 10 days after the passage of this act, to all foreign countries with which commercial agreements in conformity with the authority granted by section 3 of the act entitled, "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, have been or shall have been entered into, of the intention of the United States to terminate such agreement at a time specified in such notice, which time shall in no case, except as hereinafter provided, be longer than the period of time specified in such agreements respectively for notice for their termination; and upon the expiration of the periods when such notice of termination shall become effective the suspension of duties provided for in such agreements shall be revoked, and thereafter importations from said countries shall be subject to no other conditions or rates of duty than those prescribed by this act and such other acts of Congress as may be continued in force: Provided, That until the expiration of the period when the notice of intention to terminate hereinbefore provided for shall have become effective, or until such date prior thereto as the high contracting parties may by mutual consent select, the terms of said commercial agreements shall remain in force: And provided further, That in the case of those commercial agreements or arrangements made in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the Tariff Act of the United States approved July 24, 1897, which contain no stipulations in regard to their termination by diplomatic action, the President is authorized to give to the governments concerned a notice of termination of 6 months, which notice shall date from April 30, 1909.

SECTION IV

A. That for the purpose of readjusting the present duties on importations into the United States and at the same time to encourage the export trade of this country, the President of the United States is authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

SEC. 315. (a) That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in costs of production of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country he shall by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this act shown by said ascertained differences in such costs of production necessary to equalize the same. Thirty days after the date of such proclamation or proclamations such changes in classification shall take effect, and such increased or decreased duties shall be levied, collected, and paid on such articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila): Provided, That the total increase or decrease of such rates of duty shall not exceed 50 percent of the rates specified in title I of this act, or in any amendatory act.

(b) That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whether the President, upon investigation of the differences in costs of production of articles provided for in title I of this act, wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties prescribed in this act do not equalize said differences, and shall further find it thereby shown that the said differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country cannot be equalized by proceeding under the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section, he shall make such findings public, together with a description of the articles to which they apply, in such detail as may be necessary for the guidance of appraising officers. In such cases and upon the proclamation by the President becoming effective the ad valorem duty or duty based in whole or in part upon the value of the imported article in the country of exportation shall thereafter be based upon the American selling price, as defined in subdivision (f) of section 402 of this act, of any similar competitive article manufactured or produced in the United States embraced within the class or kind of imported articles upon which the President has made a proclamation under subdivision (b) of this section.

The ad valorem rate or rates of duty based upon such American selling price shall be the rate found, upon said investigation by the President, to be shown by the said differences in costs of production necessary to equalize such differences, but no such rate shall be decreased more than 50 percent of the rate specified in title I of this act upon such articles, nor shall any such rate be increased. Such rate or rates of duty shall become effective 15 days after the date of the said proclamation of the President, whereupon the duties so estimated and provided shall be levied, collected, and paid on such articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila). If there is any imported article within the class or kind of articles, upon which the President has made public a finding, for which there is no similar competitive article manufactured or produced in the United States, the value of such imported article shall be determined under the provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subdivision (a) of section 402 of this act.

(c) That in ascertaining the differences in costs of production, under the provisions of subdivisions (a) and (b) of this section, the President, insofar as he finds it practicable, shall take into consideration (1) the differences in conditions in production, including wages, costs of material, and other items in costs of production of such or similar articles in the United States and in competing foreign countries; (2) the differences in the wholesale selling prices of domestic and foreign articles in the principal markets of the United States; (3) advantages granted to a foreign producer by a foreign government, or by a person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country; and (4) any other advantages or disadvantages in competition.

Investigations to assist the President in ascertaining differences in costs of production under this section shall be made by the United States Tariff Commission, and no proclamation shall be issued under this section until such investigation shall have been made. The Commission shall give reasonable public notice of its hearings and shall give reasonable opportunity to parties interested to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard. The Commission is authorized to adopt such reasonable procedure, rules, and regulations as it may deem necessary.

The President, proceeding as hereinbefore provided for in proclaiming rates of duty, shall, when he determines that it is shown that the differences in costs of production have changed or no longer exist which led to such proclamation, accordingly as so shown, modify or terminate the same. Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize a transfer of an article from the dutiable list to the free list or from the free list to the dutiable list, nor a change in form of duty. Whenever it is provided in any paragraph of title I of this act that the duty or duties shall not exceed a specified ad valorem rate upon the articles provided for in such paragraph, no rate determined under the provision of this section upon such articles shall exceed the maximum ad valorem rate so specified.

(d) For the purposes of this section any coal-tar product provided for in paragraphs 27 or 28 of title I of this act shall be considered similar to or competitive with any imported coal-tar product which accomplishes results substantially equal to those accomplished by the domestic product when used in substantially the same manner.

(e) The President is authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 316. (a) That unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of articles into the United States, or in their sale by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of either, the effect or tendency of which is to destroy or substantially injure an industry, efficiently and economically operated, in the United States, or to prevent the establishment of such an industry, or to restrain or monopolize trade and commerce in the United States, are hereby declared unlawful, and when found by the President to exist shall be dealt with, in addition to any other provisions of law, as hereinafter provided.

(b) That to assist the President in making any decisions under this section the United States Tariff Commission is hereby authorized to investigate any alleged violation hereof on complaint under oath or upon its initiative.

(c) That the Commission shall make such investigation under and in accordance with such rules as it may promulgate and give such notice and afford such hearing, and when deemed proper by the commission such rehearing with opportunity to offer evidence, oral or written, as it may deem sufficient for a full presentation of the facts involved in such investigation; that the testimony in every such investigation shall be reduced to writing, and a transcript thereof with the findings and recommendation of the Commission shall be the official record of the proceedings and findings in the case, and in any case where the findings in such investigation show a violation of this section, a copy of the findings shall be promptly mailed or delivered to the importer or consignee of such articles; that such findings, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, except that a rehearing may be granted by the Commission and except that within such time after said findings are made and in such manner as appeals may be taken from decisions of the United States Board of General Appraisers, an appeal may be taken from said findings upon a question or questions of law only to the United States Court of Customs Appeals by the importer or consignee of such articles; that if it shall be shown to the satisfaction of said court that further evidence should be taken, and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceedings before the Commission, said court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper; that the Commission may modify its findings as to the facts or make new findings by reason of additional evidence, which, if supported by the evidence, shall be conclusive as to the facts except that within such time and in such manner an appeal may be taken as aforesaid upon a question or questions of law only; that the judgment of said court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the United States Supreme Court upon certiorari applied for within 3 months after such judgment of the United States Court of Customs Appeals.

(d) That the final findings of the Commission shall be transmitted with the record to the President.

(e) That whenever the existence of any such unfair method or act shall be established to the satisfaction of the President he shall determine the rate of additional duty, not exceeding 50 nor less than 10 percent of the value of such articles as defined in section 402 of title IV of this act, which will offset such method or act, and which is hereby imposed upon articles imported in violation of this act, or, in what he shall be satisfied and find are extreme cases of unfair methods or acts as aforesaid, he shall direct that such articles as he shall deem the interests of the United States shall require, imported by any person violating the provisions of this act, shall be excluded from entry into the United States, and upon information of such action by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the proper officers, assess such additional duties or refuse such entry; and that the decision of the President shall be conclusive.

(f) That whenever the President has reason to believe that any article is offered or sought to be offered for entry into the United States in violation of this section, but has not information sufficient to satisfy him thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon his request in writing, forbid entry thereof until such investigations as the President may deem necessary shall be completed: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may permit entry under bond upon such conditions and penalties as he may deem adequate.

(g) That any additional duty or any refusal of entry under this section shall continue in effect until the President shall find and instruct the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions which led to the assessment of such additional duty or refusal of entry no longer exist.

SEC. 317. (a) That the President when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby shall by proclamation specify and declare new or additional duties as hereinafter provided upon articles wholly or in part the growth or product of any foreign country whenever he shall find as a fact that such country—

Imposes, directly or indirectly, upon the disposition in or transportation in transit through or reexportation from such country of any article wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States any unreasonable charge, exaction, regulation, or limitation which is not equally enforced upon the like articles of every foreign country;

Discriminates in fact against the commerce of the United States, directly or indirectly, by law or administrative regulation or practice, by or in respect to any customs, tonnage, or port duty, fee, charge, exaction, classification, regulation, condition, restriction, or prohibition, in such manner as to place the commerce of the United States at a disadvantage compared with the commerce of any foreign country.

(b) If at any time the President shall find it to be a fact that any foreign country has not only discriminated against the commerce of the United States, as aforesaid, but has, after the issuance of a proclamation as authorized in subdivision (a) of this section, maintained or increased its said discriminations against the commerce of the United States, the President is hereby authorized, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, to issue a further proclamation directing that such articles of said country as he shall deem the public interests may require shall be excluded from importation into the United States.

(c) That any proclamation issued by the President under the authority of this section shall, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, extend to the whole of any foreign country or may be confined to any subdivision or subdivisions thereof; and the President shall, whenever he deems the public interests require, suspend, revoke, supplement, or amend any such proclamation.

(d) Whenever the President shall find as a fact that any foreign country places any burdens upon the commerce of the United States by any of the unequal impositions or discriminations aforesaid, he shall, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, by proclamation specify and declare such new or additional rate or rates of duty as he shall determine will offset such burdens, not to exceed 50 percent ad valorem or its equivalent, and on and after 30 days after the date of such proclamation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles enumerated in such proclamation when imported into the United States from such foreign country such new or additional rate or rates of duty; or, in case of articles declared subject to exclusion from importation into the United States under the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section, such articles shall be excluded from importation.

(e) Whenever the President shall find as a fact that any foreign country imposes any unequal imposition or discrimination as aforesaid upon the commerce of the United States, or that any benefits accrue or are likely to accrue to any industry in any foreign country by reason of any such imposition or discrimination imposed by any foreign country other than the foreign country in which such industry is located, and whenever the President shall determine that any new or additional rate or rates of duty or any prohibition hereinbefore provided for do not effectively remove such imposition or discrimination, and that any benefits from any such imposition or discrimination accrue or are likely to accrue to any industry in any foreign country, he shall, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, by proclamation specify and declare such new or additional rate or rates of duty upon the articles wholly or in part the growth or product of any such industry as he shall determine will offset such benefits, not to exceed 50 percent ad valorem or its equivalent, upon importation from any foreign country into the United States of such articles and on and after 30 days after the date of any such proclamation such new or additional rate or rates of duty so specified and declared in such proclamation shall be levied, collected, and paid upon such articles.

(f) All articles imported contrary to the provisions of this section shall be forfeited to the United States and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in like manner and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions as may from time to time be established for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of forfeitures to the United States by the several revenue laws. Whenever the provisions of this act shall be applicable to importations into the United States of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of any foreign country, they shall be applicable thereto whether such articles are imported directly or indirectly.

(g) It shall be the duty of the United States Tariff Commission to ascertain and at all times to be informed whether any of the discriminations against the commerce of the United States enumerated in subdivisions (a), (b), and (e) of this section are practiced by any country; and if and when such discriminatory acts are disclosed, it shall be the duty of the Commission to bring the matter to the attention of the President, together with recommendations.

(h) The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, shall make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the execution of such proclamations as the President may issue in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(i) That when used in this section the term "foreign country" shall mean any empire, country, dominion, colony, or protectorate, or any subdivision or subdivisions thereof (other than the United States and its possessions), within which separate tariff rates or separate regulations of commerce are enforced.

SEC. 318. (a) That in order that the President and the Congress may secure information and assistance, it shall be the duty of the United States Tariff Commission, in addition to the duties now imposed upon it by law, to—

(1) Ascertain conversion costs and costs of production in the principal growing, producing, or manufacturing centers of the United States of articles of the United States, whenever in the opinion of the Commission it is practicable;

(2) Ascertain conversion costs and costs of production in the principal growing, producing, or manufacturing centers of foreign countries of articles imported into the United States, whenever in the opinion of the Commission such conversion costs or costs of production are necessary for comparison with conversion costs or costs of production in the United States and can be reasonably ascertained;

(3) Select and describe articles which are representative of the classes or kinds of articles imported into the United States and which are similar to or comparable with articles of the United States; select and describe articles of the United States similar to or comparable with such imported articles, and obtain and file samples of articles so selected, whenever the Commission deems it advisable;

(4) Ascertain import costs of such representative articles so selected;

(5) Ascertain the grower's, producer's, or manufacturer's selling prices in the principal growing, producing, or manufacturing centers of the United States of the articles of the United States so selected; and

(6) Ascertain all other facts which will show the differences in or which affect competition between articles of the United States and imported articles in the principal markets of the United States.

(b) When used in this section—

The term "article" includes any commodity, whether grown, produced, fabricated, manipulated, or manufactured.

The term "import cost" means the price at which an article is freely offered for sale in the ordinary course of trade in the usual wholesale quantities for exportation to the United States plus, when not included in such price, all necessary expenses, exclusive of customs duties, of bringing such imported article to the United States.

(c) In carrying out the provisions of this section the Commission shall possess all the powers and privileges conferred upon it by the provisions of title VII of the Revenue Act of 1916, and in addition it is authorized, in order to ascertain any facts required by this section, to require any importer and any American grower, producer, manufacturer, or seller to file with the Commission a statement, under oath, giving his selling prices in the United States of any article imported, grown, produced, fabricated, manipulated, or manufactured by him.

(d) The Commission is authorized to establish and maintain an office at the port of New York for the purpose of directing or carrying on any investigation, receiving and compiling statistics, selecting, describing, and filing samples of articles, and performing any of the duties or exercising any of the powers imposed upon it by law.

(e) The United States Tariff Commission is authorized to adopt an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

(f) The second paragraph of section 706 of the Revenue Act of 1916 is amended to read as follows:

"Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpena the Commission may invoke the aid of any District or Territorial court of the United States or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and such court within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any corporation or other person, issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before the Commission, or to produce documentary evidence, if so ordered, or to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof."

SEC. 319. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported, for which no entry has been made, and all goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to the duties imposed by this act and to no other duty upon the entry or the withdrawal thereof: Provided, That when duties are based upon the weight of merchandise deposited in any public or private bonded warehouse said duties shall be levied and collected upon the weight of such merchandise at the time of its entry.

SEC. 320. That nothing in this act shall be construed to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, or the provisions of the act of December 17, 1903, chapter 1.

RATIFICATION BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

The United States has entered into 22 reciprocal-trade agreements under the authority of the act of June 12, 1934. The action of the foreign contracting government in each case separates such agreements into the following three categories.

I. Agreements became effective without any requirement of subsequent legislative action in the foreign country.

1. Belgium.
2. Cuba.
3. Ecuador.

II. Agreements became effective provisionally subject to eventual legislative action in the foreign country, and such subsequent legislative action has been taken in all but three countries as noted below.

1. Canada (two agreements).
2. Czechoslovakia—not ratified and ratification cannot now be expected.
3. France—subsequent legislative action has not yet been taken, so agreement is in effect only provisionally.
4. Netherlands.
5. Switzerland.
6. Turkey.
7. United Kingdom.
8. Venezuela—not yet ratified but ratification expected.

III. Agreements did not become effective until they had received legislative approval in the foreign country. (Such approval has been given by all the countries.)

1. Brazil.
2. Colombia.
3. Costa Rica.
4. El Salvador.
5. Finland.
6. Guatemala.
7. Haiti.
8. Honduras.
9. Nicaragua.
10. Sweden.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, we have before us the bill for renewal of the law authorizing reciprocal-trade agreements between the United States and the governments of foreign nations.

These agreements, which have been brilliantly executed by Secretary Hull, constitute an important factor in our foreign policy.

Historically, contending political forces in our Nation have divided into two camps on the question of foreign trade. For many years, particularly when American industry was experiencing its early period of growth, the doctrine of protection was dominant.

It eventually became apparent, however, that this doctrine was being carried to a dangerous point and that it was establishing barriers which restricted normal commercial relations with other countries.

Under high protective tariffs American consumers of manufactured products were, in many instances, penalized in order to provide excessive profits for small groups of industrialists.

The benefits accruing from this policy of protection were not reflected in higher standards of living for labor, but instead resulted in those fabulous concentrations of wealth which were such a conspicuous outgrowth of our early industrial history under protective tariffs.

In opposition to this system there emerged a school of thought which held that the best interests of the country would be served, not by economic isolation, but by a carefully regulated policy which would keep open the channels of foreign trade without subjecting American industry and agriculture to unfair competition in the domestic markets.

In this broad division of thought on a major national question it was inevitable that the Republican Party, because of the influence exerted upon it by large industrialists, should champion the protective tariff.

It was just as inevitable that the Democratic Party, concerning itself with the broader interests of the average citizen, should advocate trade expansion.

While the broad division of policy between the parties has been clear down the years neither side has clung strictly to an extreme position.

Advocates of unrestricted free trade in the Democratic Party gradually adjusted their position to meet the problem created by trade barriers in foreign countries.

Republican champions of extreme protection began to realize that economic isolation was neither wise nor profitable for America.

Republican Presidents and other public officials faced with the practical problems of foreign policy found themselves opposing the traditional high-protection policy of their party, with the result that we have on the record statements by many Republican Presidents and statesmen in support of reciprocal trade.

It was early apparent that the fixing of specific tariffs by the Congress resulted inevitably in so much logrolling that the schedules adopted were unscientific and often economically demoralizing.

It was eventually realized that the task of framing schedules was one requiring great technical knowledge, and I doubt that anyone in Congress today would seriously contend that the old-fashioned method of tariff writing by Congress should replace the present flexible system whereby Congress lays down specific and clear-cut policies and limitations, prescribes rules of procedure, and then delegates a certain portion of its authority over the details of tariff matters to the administrative branch of the Government.

It has been said that American industry flourished and became great under a system of protective tariffs.

Whether it would not have flourished as well under a different system is an academic question, with advocates of both systems bringing forth proof.

However, it cannot reasonably be argued, because American industry prospered in the past—either because of or in spite of high tariffs—that such a policy is justified under present conditions.

Since the World War America's position among the nations of the world has considerably changed. Before that war America was a debtor Nation.

After the war we became a creditor nation. That one fact has had a profound effect upon our entire internal economy and it forms a basic consideration in our foreign affairs.

When we were a debtor nation we sent our goods abroad to pay debts we owed to foreigners.

Now that we are a creditor nation we must accept goods from abroad if we are to be paid for our exports and if we are to receive any payments on debts foreigners owe us.

No one will dispute the fact that America wants and needs foreign trade.

We have both agricultural and industrial surpluses as well as the capacity to produce even greater surpluses over domestic needs should foreign markets be available for them.

With that point established we move to the problem of expanding our world markets.

If we sell abroad we expect something of value in exchange.

In fact, there are only three ways in which it is possible for us to conduct foreign trade at all: First, by exchanging goods; second, by extending credit; and third, by accepting gold or some other medium of exchange.

The free interchange of goods, without any trade barriers whatever, is something for which we cannot hope in the present state of world affairs.

The advancing of virtually unlimited credit has obvious disadvantages. It was practiced in open-handed fashion after the war, with the result that American investors lost billions of dollars abroad.

The third method has definite limitations, for we are now steadily acquiring possession of most of the world's gold and are beginning to wonder what we are going to do with it, for unless gold can be resumed as a basis for the world's currencies, its value must depreciate sharply, in which event we will again lose.

Learning by the trial-and-error method we inevitably come back to the one simple truth of foreign trade, which is that we cannot continue to sell unless we also buy.

James G. Blaine stated that very vehemently 50 years ago in a committee hearing in Washington.

Secretary Hull has spent most of his lifetime preaching that doctrine.

Since the act was passed giving him authority to negotiate trade agreements, he has brilliantly demonstrated its validity.

In the hearings on this subject, we have had presented on both sides the arguments as to the desirability of continuing the trade-agreement program.

I find no merit in contentions concerning the probable or possible future effect if agreements hereafter negotiated are unwisely drafted.

This has been the theme of many an opponent of the bill. It is clear that we may confidently expect our administrative departments to conduct their operations wisely, in accordance with the intentions of Congress, until such time as we have positive evidence to the contrary.

The only true test of the wisdom of this legislation, and of the intelligence exercised in its administration, is in the results which have been obtained during the comparatively short period during which it has been in effect.

It is natural that in making a readjustment of our foreign trade, we may during the process of adjustment disturb some part of our own internal economy.

It is regrettable, but true, that not all will enjoy equal benefits. In fact, some who have been heavily protected by tariff barriers in the past may find themselves temporarily at a disadvantage.

It is natural and proper that these groups should express their protests; but in its final judgment the Senate must remember that the greatest good for the greatest number can be the only proper basis for action.

In this connection, I wish to call particular attention to the President's message of January 3 on the state of the Nation, in which he said:

> For many years after the World War, as we know today, blind economic selfishness in most countries, including our own, resulted in a destructive mine field of trade restrictions which blocked the channels of commerce among nations.
> Indeed, this policy was one of the contributing causes of existing wars. It dammed up vast unsalable surpluses, helping to bring about unemployment and suffering in the United States and everywhere else.
> To point out the way to break up the log jamb, our Trade Agreements Act was passed.
> Our present trade-agreement method provided a temporary flexibility, and is, therefore, practical in the best sense.
> It should be kept alive to serve our trade interests—agricultural and industrial—in many valuable ways during the existing wars.
> * * * I emphasize the leadership which this Nation can take when a time comes for a renewal of world peace. Such an influence will be greatly weakened if this Government becomes a dog in the manger of trade selfishness.

We must recognize that too often in the past it was the selfishness of small groups in our country which was responsible for tariff policies completely at variance with the welfare of the general public.

The Hawley-Smoot tariff gave rise to a succession of trade barriers throughout the world. It was in many ways responsible for the drying up of the stream of commerce between nations.

While it would be unjust to place entire responsibility for our own economic collapse upon this tariff, no one can reasonably deny that it was an important factor, and it will be recalled that the leading economists of the country urged President Hoover to veto it.

It may be said that American industry collapsed despite the high-protection schedules of the Hawley-Smoot tariff, but it is my own conviction that in part it collapsed because of them.

Economic history has placed a large share of responsibility on that excessive-tariff policy.

Any proper judgment of a national policy must be based upon its results. Between 1929 and 1933 our exports declined from $5,241,000,000 to $1,675,000,000.

After the trade-agreement program was enacted in 1933 our exports rose steadily, reaching $3,123,869,000 in 1939.

There can be no doubt that here we have a direct case of cause and effect. Export trade does not increase without good reasons.

The increase of our trade with trade-agreement countries was far greater in proportion than the increase in our trade with nonagreement nations.

In 1936, exports to agreement countries rose 14 percent, whereas they increased only 4 percent in the case of other countries.

In 1937, exports to countries concluding agreements were 60 percent greater than in 1935, whereas the increase over the same period in the case of other countries was only 39 percent.

In the 2-year period 1938–39, annual average exports from the United States to trade-agreement countries were 63 percent, and to nonagreement countries only 38 percent greater than annual average exports to the same countries in the 2-year period 1934–35.

It is perfectly clear from the statistics, which have not been challenged, that America has enjoyed a far greater export trade as a result of the agreements concluded under the direction of Secretary Hull.

This is generally admitted; yet there are many who insist upon this very sizable cake of export trade and still wish to hold on to the penny by placing drastic restrictions upon import trade.

They still fail to see that we cannot sell without also buying.

Admitting that this increasing export trade is a very nice thing to have, they insist that we pay too high a price by opening the way for foreign competition in our domestic markets.

The facts, however, do not bear out their contention, nor do they give any basis for fears that imports permitted under the agreements adversely affect American agriculture and industry.

United States imports rose $375,000,000 in 1936 and $661,000,000 higher in 1937. During 1936, imports from the 14 trade-agreement countries increased 22 percent over 1935, while imports from nonagreement countries rose 16 percent.

In 1937 our imports of raw materials for industrial expansion, mostly from nonagreement countries, reversed this trend, the increase being 18 percent for agreement countries and 34 percent for nonagreement countries.

While average exports of manufactured goods to trade-agreement countries were $353,000,000 more in 1937 and 1938 than they were in 1934 and 1935, dutiable imports of manufactured goods from these countries increased only $88,000,000 in the same period.

As we study item after item of these imported goods, we find that through intelligent bargaining the Department of State has been able to do a splendid work of reconciling proper protection of American industry with expansion of export trade.

In many instances our imports from agreement countries consist of materials not available here in sufficient quantities to meet the needs of the domestic market.

Reliable testimony presented before the Finance Committee demonstrated that America has obtained by far the best of the bargain.

Much has been made of the argument that under these agreements the American worker's job is being threatened by a flood of cheaply made competitive foreign articles.

Mr. Isador Lubin, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, has refuted this contention with a well-documented statement buttressing his conclusions, which are as follows:

1. Trade agreements have opened the way for a very considerable increase of exports of manufactured goods, thereby providing additional employment in the production of these goods.
2. The additional employment created in export industries by the trade agreements has exceeded any displacement of labor in other industries which might conceivably have resulted from concessions made by the United States to foreign countries.
3. Concessions granted by the United States on the products of foreign countries have displaced far less labor in this country than is often claimed.
4. Wage rates in the export industries which have benefited from trade agreements are, by and large, considerably higher than the wages in those industries which have claimed injury as a result of trade agreements.

Certainly it is obvious, without delving too deeply into statistics, that if the agreements have increased manufactured exports $353,000,000 and imports only $88,000,000, the balance is preponderantly in favor of the American worker.

In fact, the Department of Commerce estimates that from 1933 to 1937 the number of those directly employed in the production of exported manufactures increased by approximately 300,000.

This is exclusive of the additional employment indirectly created in transportation, production of raw materials, and the like.

It is clear that the trade-agreement program has created many more jobs here than it could possibly have displaced.

Interestingly enough, Mr. Lubin's statistics show that industries complaining against so-called cheap labor competition under the agreements normally have a lower average wage—54.8 cents an hour in 1937—than other industries which are primarily on an export basis, and therefore unsheltered by any tariff, the latter group having an average hourly wage of 75.2 cents.

It is a fact that the trade agreements have not only helped in the recovery of foreign trade, but thus have helped to reduce domestic unemployment.

The outstanding success of the trade-agreement program is the best reason in the world for its continuance; yet we find many who still insist that this question be made a political issue, even though outstanding Republicans, among them industrialists and financiers, as well as political leaders, are enthusiastically in accord with the program.

In fact, for many years Republican statesmen have supported the principles upon which the trade-agreement program rests. I should like to call attention in this connection to a statement made by Charles P. Taft, son of the former President:

Blaine, McKinley, and my own father spoke and worked for reciprocity.

Said Mr. Taft:

Chief Justice Hughes, as Secretary of State, made the most-favored-nation clause a part of our foreign policy.
What Secretary Hull has added is the method of writing tariffs without congressional politics.

Mr. Taft merely called attention to a well-established fact, which is that some of the most eloquent statements of the case for the basic principles of this trade-agreement program were made by distinguished Republicans.

President McKinley, in the last speech of his life, which I had the good fortune to hear, made only a few hours before his assassination, summed up the situation in his address at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo on September 5, 1901:

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production—

He said—

we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade.
We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing.
If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal.
We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.
Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established.
What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad.
The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.
The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable.
A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.
If, perchance, some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

It is interesting to note that the Republicans who use the statement of President McKinley to support their opposition to the present modern reciprocity program generally go back to his inaugural address of 1897.

It should be remembered that this was before his experience in attempting to get his "reciprocity treaties" through the Senate.

It is well known that he was sadly disappointed in his efforts to obtain a reasonable measure of reciprocity because the Senate balked on him, and thus his outright utterance already quoted.

President Taft made a valiant fight, in the face of strenuous opposition within his own party, to negotiate a reciprocal-trade agreement with Canada in 1911.

With the aid of the Democrats, he succeeded to the extent that the treaty was ratified by the United States Senate, and had it not been for the failure of Canada to accept the treaty it is likely that reciprocity would have been an established policy of the United States Government long before Franklin Roosevelt became President and Cordell Hull became Secretary of State.

Taft looked upon the defeat of the measure as a "real loss to both countries." Nor was that defeat of reciprocity the end of his attempt to provide more equitable tariffs.

With the establishment of his tariff board, he took the first major step toward scientific solution of a highly complex problem, and throughout the latter part of his administration he was insistently demanding sounder tariff measures.

The entire question had been left on his doorstep by Theodore Roosevelt, who also favored reciprocity, but was persuaded by Speaker Cannon to avoid making an issue of it.

Taft's battle clarified the issue, however, and the new Congress swept into office with President Wilson was a Congress elected on a platform of "tariff for revenue only."

The Republican opposition to reciprocity in Taft's time was widely at variance with the position taken by that party in previous years.

It has been brought out in debate in the House of Representatives that the Republican Party had a reciprocity plank in its platform of 1892, and repeated substantially the same demands in its platforms of 1896 and 1904.

President Taft, while battling his own party on the Canadian issue, wrote to Theodore Roosevelt, his predecessor, and asked his opinion of the situation. Taft pointed out that the Republican Party had been forced to concede the necessity for downward revision of tariffs and that it had departed from—

The rule upheld by Shaw and Cannon and other standard bearers of the orthodox type that no tariff could be too high, because what you needed was a Chinese wall.

Theodore Roosevelt wrote back at once, commenting that:

What you propose to do with Canada is admirable from every standpoint. I certainly believe in free trade with Canada for both economic and political reasons.

The failure of the efforts made in behalf of reciprocity by such Republican Presidents as McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft marked the end of the effort to liberalize Republican tariff policies, for when the Republican Party returned to power after the Wilson administration the old guard again had its way. The Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922 raised rates to one of the highest levels in our tariff history, but even this was not enough for the greedy industrialists who controlled the Republican organization, and I am sorry I must admit that the most shameful tariff ever devised, the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930, originated in my own State of Pennsylvania. It was written by Joe Grundy, then and now the leading figure in the Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Association, and vice president of the American Tariff League.

It is interesting to observe that Joe Grundy and his associates, the traditional enemies of labor, developed this monstrous legislation to safeguard their special privileges on the pretext that it protected the worker. The benefits obtained under this and other high tariffs did not go to the worker, as the worker well knows. He was exploited and kept in subjection, forced to labor under inhuman conditions for mere subsistence, while Joe Grundy and others of his kind siphoned off the rich profits accruing from this "protection."

Yet even during this Harding-Coolidge-Hoover era of prohibitive tariffs, there were Republican leaders who viewed with apprehension the effect of such policies upon American economic life. President Harding himself wrote to Chief Justice Hughes, former Secretary of State, in defense of reciprocity.

I am well convinced—

that the adoption of unconditional most-favored-nation policy is the simpler way to maintain our tariff policy in accordance with the recently enacted law—Tariff Act of 1922—and is probably the sure way of effectively extending our trade abroad.

Frank Knox, the Republican Vice Presidential candidate only 4 years ago, stated last year:

To sell American farm products abroad, we must buy some of what our foreign customers have to sell.
You cannot always sell and never buy in foreign markets.

Various features of the present trade-agreement legislation have in the past received the support of outstanding Republican leaders.

When it was argued that the placing of such authority in the Department of State was an unconstitutional delegation of power, Hon. Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of State, declared:

I am not impressed with the objection that it would give undue or dictatorial powers to our Executive.
It does not seem to me that such objections are well founded.

At the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee in 1937, Hon. William S. Culbertson stated:

The Republicans themselves in the Tariff Acts of 1890 and 1897 established so far as our commercial policy was concerned, the principle of systematic reciprocity; namely, a law on which Congress defined the principle on which reciprocity is to proceed and develop, and then leaves it to the Executive to carry out the details.

In the same year the argument that reciprocity endangered the American standard of living was answered by the well-known Republican financial writer, Roger W. Babson. He wrote:

The best protection for the American standard of living is to stimulate world commerce.
Tariffs, quotas, and other trade barriers must be lowered if the world is to escape a complete economic and moral break-down.
Hence I believe that Secretary of State Hull's reciprocal-trade policy is the most encouraging development in world affairs today.
The only way the trade barriers can be eliminated is by mutually lowering them over a period of time.

Two Republican Governors from New England, widely separated in time but not in beliefs, defended the principle of reciprocity. One was former Governor and Senator McCall, of Massachusetts, who in 1902 made an impassioned speech for the bill establishing reciprocal-trade relations with Cuba. Another was former Governor Winant, of New Hampshire, whose annual report to the international labor office last year stated:

Economic isolation is not the solution of the problem presented by the unequal distribution of natural resources and by the needs for markets unless the workers are prepared to work longer hours, eat less and lower quality of food, and live in poor dwellings.

The Republican Party would do well to consider not only these views of well-known Republicans on specific phases of the problem but also the summation of another Republican, Nicholas Roosevelt:

Wise and courageous Republican leadership—must be prepared, in dealing with this problem—foreign trade—to cast aside hide-bound traditions of the party and to act, not in accordance with the heritage of Mark Hanna and Boies Penrose but rather with a view to the needs of the United States of today and tomorrow.

He said—

I have raised the question that the Hawley-Smoot tariff by erecting barriers to shut off our trade with foreign nations shared in no small measure the responsibility for those economic dislocations which intensified bitterness between nations, a bitterness which is now finding its expression on the battlefields of Europe.

Just as a bad tariff breeds conflict, so can a good tariff promote peace.

Nations which enjoy friendly and profitable trade relations with each other do not incline toward warfare.

Again I refer, not to what Democrats have said on this subject, but to what leading Republicans have said. One of these was James P. Warburg.

You have started the world on the way to peace for the first time since 1914.

Mr. Warburg wrote to Secretary Hull in 1936:

You have held fast to your beliefs and principles, and, thanks to your patience and perseverance in the face of frequent opposition within and without the administration, you have made progress.

Another leading Republican, Thomas W. Lamont, made the same point in an address before the Economic Club of New York at the end of 1938. He said:

Peace will not be maintained unless a very distinct effort is made. * * * In that connection, may I, as a life-long Republican, associate myself with what Dr. Van Zeeland, Mr. Young, and Mr. Aldrich have said as to the Hull treaties—I am very strongly for the work that Mr. Secretary Hull, the present Secretary of State, has done. * * * His are distinct and helpful steps in building up the trade which is necessary to peace.

I have dwelt at length upon opinions expressed by prominent Republicans in favor of such a program as we are now considering because they indicate with finality that this question is, or should be, nonpartisan.

Yet, as we review the testimony which has been placed in the RECORD by responsible and qualified persons, partisanship appears to be the only remaining barrier to passage of this legislation.

The evidence shows that the trade-agreement program has worked and worked well. It has greatly increased American foreign markets.

It has provided employment at home for hundreds of thousands of American workers.

In no case has it been clearly and unquestionably demonstrated that in any way it has unjustly discriminated against or penalized American industry or agriculture.

It has set in motion those forces of peaceful world trade which offer the only remaining hope for any enduring peace among nations.

It has contributed in heroic measure to the solution of domestic economic problems arising from our creation of large industrial and agricultural surpluses.

Its advantages are manifest, for they have been demonstrated by experience.

I see no reason, under such circumstances, why the obstacle of partisanship should be opposed to this legislation, particularly in view of the position taken by so many outstanding Republican leaders in both the past and the present.

I would warn those who wish to throw this issue into the political arena that such a policy is dangerous, not only to our country but to the Republican Party as well.

Let the Republican leadership remember that just such partisan blindness in the early years of this century helped to bring about the election of Woodrow Wilson.

Let that leadership remember that the Republican tariffs promulgated after the World War were in a certain measure—and no one will ever know how great a measure—responsible for the financial collapse which very nearly destroyed not only the Republican Party but the country as well.

I ask in all sincerity that the lessons of the past be remembered and that this legislation be judged impartially upon the record of its past operation.

Upon that record it should pass unanimously.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I shall support wholeheartedly the Pittman amendment now pending before the Senate. As I see it, this is a great day for those who believe in free trade. I am a protectionist, always expect to be a protectionist, and I have always supported the protective principle, because I believe the American market belongs to the American farmer, the American worker, and the American manufacturer.

I have before me a letter written by Richard P. Brown, the secretary of commerce of Pennsylvania, in which he says:

The pamphlet, dated December 1939, issued by the Department of State, Washington, D. C., entitled "Benefits to Pennsylvania From Reciprocal Trade Agreements," implies that there have been only benefits to Pennsylvania from the reciprocal-trade agreements and no injurious results:

This pamphlet contains the following statement:

"Since the Trade Agreements Act was approved, agreements have been negotiated with 21 countries. With so many variables in the economic situation here and abroad affecting the movement of trade, it is impossible to determine precisely the extent to which trade agreements have helped to restore the increased foreign markets for American farm and factory products."

The statement would be more accurate if it read:

"It is impossible to determine precisely the extent to which trade agreements have injured American farms and factories."

Mr. Brown goes on to say:

In 1939, a better business year than 1938, our exports increased only 3 percent, including the tremendous volume of materials shipped abroad in connection with the war, yet imports increased 18 percent. This condition certainly indicated that reciprocal-trade agreements are injurious rather than beneficial to Pennsylvania farms and factories.

Sixty percent of our imported products are noncompeting products, such as bananas, coffee, rubber, tin, etc., which come in duty-free. The other 40 percent are dutiable products competing with American farms and factories and it is to this 40 percent that the reciprocal-trade agreements apply, to the injury of Pennsylvania agriculture and industry.

The old and long-established Pennsylvania industries, such as agriculture, mining, and textiles, have suffered most from the reciprocal-trade agreements in competing with the products of low-wage countries. The newer industries such as electrical equipment and automobiles, in which the technique of manufacture has been largely the result of American development and which are equipped with the latest labor-saving devices, naturally suffer the least in competition with the products of low-wage countries.

What do we need from Europe? Certainly not coal, steel, and agricultural products, yet we have been buying large quantities of these products under the reciprocal-trade agreements.

Still quoting Mr. Brown, the secretary of commerce of Pennsylvania:

Take anthracite coal for example. Pennsylvania produces 99 percent of the anthracite coal mined in the United States. Production has fallen to approximately half of what it formerly was because of competition with other fuels and other causes, with thousands of Pennsylvania miners unemployed or on short time, yet under an agreement with Russia, that country is permitted to ship in, duty-free, up to 400,000 tons of anthracite coal per year.

The following tonnage of Russian anthracite was imported duty-free into the United States since this agreement with Russia was executed:

	Tons
1937 (last 6 months)	93,245
1938	200,482
1939	212,442

Mr. Brown goes on to state what other industries have been affected.

I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of Mr. Brown's letter be placed in the RECORD as part of my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Pennsylvania is a great steel-producing State, yet we have been importing large quantities of steel products under the reciprocal-trade agreements during a period when thousands of Pennsylvania steel workers were idle.

Of what advantage was it to the Pennsylvania steel industry and Pennsylvania steel workers that 3,883,573 pounds of Swedish wire rods were imported in 1937 under the reciprocal-trade agreements at only 4-percent duty?

What help is being afforded to Lehigh and Northampton Counties, the centers of the American cement industry, when, after a reduction of 4½ cents per hundred pounds in the duty, we imported in 1 year 377,613,000 pounds of Portland cement from Belgium and 49,449,619 pounds from Holland?

Leaf tobacco is an important Pennsylvania agricultural commodity, the export of which showed a very sharp decrease during 1939. From a value of $139,418,000 in the first 11 months of 1938, exports of unmanufactured tobacco fell to $72,429,000 in the same period of 1939, a decrease of $66,989,000. Most of the decrease occurred in shipments to the agreement group of countries.

Our foreign trade in dollars increased under the reciprocal-trade agreements only because we were willing to exchange our goods at a discount for gold bought by us in huge quantities at a premium. Add gold into the total of imports and exports and we have had an unfavorable balance of trade to an average value of more than a billion dollars a year, for every year since 1933, and this is the first period since 1833, 100 years, when that has been true.

If this was to enable Europe to pay back its debts to us it might be justified. But Europe has defaulted on those debts. Yet we are now buying of the world a billion dollars more than we sell, and that import balance against us is chiefly with Europe and largely with the trade-agreement countries.

It must be remembered that the cost of unemployment relief reflected in the American tax bill and in our growing public debt is a rising burden on all American commerce. Unemployment is aggravated by the competition in our markets of the products of low-labor-costs countries which these treaties are constantly extending both as to agriculture and industry.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD P. BROWN,
Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the American people have repeatedly gone on record against one-man government. There is no question about the way in which they react against it. From first to last, the history of our people shows undying opposition to the arbitrary authority of political despotism. This feeling is not less pronounced today than in the past. In fact, Mr. President, I question if there ever was a time when our citizens have been more alert than now to detect the encroachments of arbitrary power.

This affords an explanation of the growing distrust over the way in which the reciprocal trade agreements program has been administered. It is an outstanding example of unrestrained increase of Executive authority without the full knowledge of the people. It is now our obligation thoroughly to consider the implications of this excessive grant of power to the Executive, lest there become fixed and established traditions and precedents which will mark the beginning of the downfall of our representative institutions of government.

Let it be made clear at the start that there are a number of points that are not really involved in the present controversy. Essentially we are not concerned with the question of whether or not these trade agreements are technically treaties. We are not discussing the relative value of foreign trade. We have no protest to register against the true principle of reciprocal trade. We are not for or against these trade treaties because we are for peace, for this relationship has been shown to be only an incidental one and not basically fundamental. We do not advocate any special view of tariff, because we believe in sectional advantage for one part of the United States at the expense of some other part. We believe that agriculture, labor, and industry are equally interested in an American plan of tariff protection and its efficient administration. The issue at stake rises much higher than the views of any special line of business or of firms engaged in the export business.

The solution of this problem cannot be regarded as a panacea for all the ills of the Nation. We are not quibbling over divergent sets of statistics on the import and the export trade. We are thoroughly opposed to any attempt to bar from the court of public opinion the findings of research experts and tariff specialists. In the United States every citizen should have a right to be heard.

Our concern is primarily that the Congress shall maintain its right of approval of trade treaties, whether such approval is given individually or collectively. The very fact of our congressional consideration of the measure now before us is indisputable evidence that the authority for making these treaties resides in Congress rather than in the Executive. The President or the Secretary of State, or their associates, have authority to negotiate these international agreements only insofar as that authority is delegated to them by Congress.

This grant of power was made in 1934. I was not in favor of it. The grant of power was renewed in 1937. Again I was opposed to it. Now an extension of the authority is sought, and again I am opposed to it. In fact, I am more opposed than ever before, because with the passing years it becomes clearer that in the enactment of this legislation Congress is divesting itself of a duty which it alone can discharge if it is to retain the authority granted to it in the Constitution. If Congress has the right—and I believe this to be beyond all peradventure of a doubt—to make a collective grant of tariff-writing authority, it has the right to retain to itself the authority to approve or withhold approval of individual trade treaties. The question before us is the practical necessity of congressional action on the individual trade treaties that are subject to negotiation by our Government.

When the Reciprocal Trade Act was first proposed, Secretary Hull appeared before the Senate Committee on Finance, which was conducting hearings on House bill 8687, which was a bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930. On Thursday, April 26, 1934, Secretary Hull said, as a part of his testimony before the committee:

> There should, I repeat, be no misunderstanding as to the nature or the purpose of this measure. It is not an extraordinary plan to deal with ordinary or normal conditions. Its support is only urged as an emergency measure to deal with a dangerous and threatening emergency situation. I would venture, in these circumstances, to express the hope that the bill be considered and acted upon in this light. I am well aware of the controversial possibilities of any proposal that might, in the least, affect the most prohibitive or embargo features of customs and other trade barriers.

Mr. President, that was the clearly defined position of Secretary Hull 7 years ago. The new trade program was to be considered exclusively as an emergency measure. It was not to be regarded as a plan to deal with ordinary or normal conditions. Since then, however, the reasons advanced for the continuation of this program have changed. The psychology of emergency has come to be regarded as one of permanence. In the name of international stabilization and world peace, this emergency program is advanced on a basis which permanently accomplishes the most ardent hopes of those who believe in free trade and a hit-and-run trade attack by low-wage competitors.

Mr. President, the urgency of the issue before us is beyond dispute. Under the 22 trade treaties negotiated to date our tariffs have been sharply reduced on over 1,000 products. These reductions affect 42 percent of our dutiable imports. The average reduction in rates has been 39 percent. Not for a single moment do I believe that such a guerilla attack on American trade protection represents the will of the great majority of our thoughtful citizens. In fact, it appears little short of international plunder that such a drastic revision of our tariff downward should have been permitted. When the full significance of these little-understood negotiations have fully been brought to the attention of the people I have no doubt as to their refusal to grant an extension of this program; for in the final analysis, although the American people are generous—possibly generous to a fault—it is not in my heart to believe they will consistently favor a policy of self-destruction.

The present program is inconsistent with the true intent of tariff reciprocity as it has been established in trade customs over a long period of time. It is inconsistent with the cherished national ideal that reciprocity demands that we confine our exchange of surpluses to the products we need but do not ourselves produce. This standard was never intended to permit the importations of low-wage foreign products in the case of articles which we already produce in great abundance at standards of work and wages incomparably higher than the generally accepted standards familiar in international trade.

The United States is the only country which has long established and permanently held to these higher standards. No other nation begins to measure up to our productive standards of living. If there were three or four other nations that maintained economic and trade standards comparable to our own, there would then be a substantial measure of realism on which to base a practical program of elastic international exchange. However, this is a condition which does not exist. There is little possibility that it will exist in the near future; and until such a condition is developed it is nothing short of national suicide for the United States to continue its present policy of giving away in piecemeal fashion the earnings of American labor, industry, and agriculture. This high-handed national charity, dispensed in the name of international peace at a time when war rages uncontrolled throughout the areas to which we have granted the most liberal trade reductions, does little credit to the judgment and prudence of the American people. It is unwise, inexpedient, misleading, and calculated to embroil us in the strife which we should in every way seek to avoid.

The question before us is not a technical one. It is not one of fine-spun distinctions in constitutional law. It is not a subject which requires the rarefied scholarship of some academic mind. It is nothing less than a matter of plain common sense which should be submitted to the Representatives of the people in Congress.

Congress has the right to pass upon these treaties collectively. If Congress has sufficient wisdom to make a full delegation of authority in this very important issue, Congress also has enough wisdom to judge the fundamental worth of each individual trade agreement as it shall arise. This is not a denial to the expert and the specialist of a proper place in the gathering of data and the presentation of factual findings. This is not a plea that Congress has a greater wisdom in matters pertaining to tariff than in other fields. It is a plea that congressional intelligence and prudence be not arbitrarily pushed aside or allowed to seem less sane than the intellectual endeavors of departmental officials.

The matter comes down to exactly this choice. Either the Representatives of the people in Congress are to be trusted with a determination of the development of our foreign-trade policy a step at a time, from first to last, and all along the line, or else Congress is not worthy to be trusted with the decision which it is now called upon to make. If departmental bureaucrats, acting under the direction of one man, can manage to gain dominance in this field, they will be equally justified in seeking dominance in every other field of public policy which has been entrusted to Congress under the Constitution, in which event we shall have no need for popular representations in the halls of Congress. Congress can be permanently retired to make way for the all-powerful state under executive control such as is found in Communist Russia or Fascist Italy or Nazi Germany.

There are those that say that these trade agreements represent a complexity of understanding too removed from the limited intellectual comprehension of Members of Congress. Mr. President, I am not making a plea for the erudition of the Members of these two worthy Chambers, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. Such a plea need not be made. It is sufficient to say that those who are elected to membership in Congress come as representatives of the people, and the combined intelligence of the many will, over a period of time, be found to exceed the value of any single intelligence, irrespective of what brilliance it may exhibit at any given time. If Congress does not know enough to pass on questions of tariff, Congress does not know enough properly to deal with the issues of taxes, education, labor, naval affairs, post offices, post roads, pensions, or any other of the many momentous problems which here daily confront us.

Mr. President, I wish to make clear that a congressional review of trade agreements would not in any way interfere with a full development of specialized information by existing agencies which currently study this field. Congress would welcome the presentation of all pertinent data in hearings before appropriate committees. Such information, together with the points of view of the representatives of agriculture, labor, industry, and transportation, should be made fully available to the public as well as to congressional committees. There is no place for star-chamber proceedings in the negotiation of trade agreements. The development of these agreements represents, in practically every instance, a development of our foreign-trade policy. Each treaty is a step in this development. Congress not only has the right to review these agreements before they are put into effect; Congress has the responsibility of doing so. It is inexpedient and disastrous to delegate this authority. A continuation of the present method of administering this phase of our foreign policy will inevitably lead to a development of one-man government, which will have its repercussions in every field of domestic activity. The tie-in between foreign and domestic affairs is inseparable. The conduct of foreign affairs affects domestic policy and domestic procedure. To give ground to one-man control on trade agreements may lead to an exercise of arbitrary power at some future date, under some other President, resulting in a domestic problem far beyond anything which we can now imagine or foresee. There is not merely such a possibility, it is a probability, and it is one which should "give us pause." We should coolly reflect upon this fundamental problem before we again make a delegation of congressional authority which would be entirely out of line with all past precedents and procedure of our National Government.

Mr. President, much has been said by the advocates of this measure about the evils of logrolling. They refer to the practice of bringing about political arrangements whereby an attempt is made to secure benefits for one section of the country in exchange for a different set of benefits for some other section. Those who talk about logrolling in tariff agreements at the present time have been strangely silent about political arrangements of this nature which have been carried on during the last 7 years in relation to the distribution of the vast sums of money which have been expended by the Federal Government. Does anyone believe that these funds were not disbursed in such a way as to give political preferment? The fact is that that has been taken for granted to such a large degree that scarcely any mention has been made of it. Now, however, when an administration measure is proposed which has prompted the opposition of red-blooded Americans the cry of logrolling is raised.

Mr. President, I am not seeking to justify the political maneuvers of this or any other administration. It is well recognized that there have been and there continue to be political abuses which cannot be explained away. It seems more than unfair, however, that the spotlight of public attention should be riveted on these developments solely in relation to the adjustment of tariff rates, for they pertain just as readily to a dozen other fields of governmental procedure.

Only profitable production in the United States is sufficient to bring dependable prosperity to this land. I do not intend to discuss the relative values of foreign and domestic trade. It must be apparent that our home market is our most vital and productive market, the one which holds the largest measure of hope for all our citizens, even though foreign trade may bring a benefit to a fractional minority. Our exports would have to be doubled to equal in volume an increase of much less than 5 percent in our home business. The free-trade war cry, "We must import if we want to export," is raised to cover the important fact that our country regularly imports rubber, coffee, sugar, vegetable oils, tin, silk, and other items in enormous quantities. Rubber, coffee, tin, silk, and many other products enter free of any duty. Nearly two-thirds of all imports pay no tariff charges at all. In addition to that, we buy from the world vast quantities of silver and gold at artificial prices; and yet there is no law in heaven or on earth which can compel foreign nations to use the benefits which they derive from us to make a fair return to us. American dollars go abroad; more often than not they are spent abroad for products of foreign nations rather than being returned for the purchase of American-made goods. In an open market the lowest offer sets the price. In the case of many products a 1-percent increase of imports can break the scale of American prices. A small rift in the lute will make the music mute.

Mr. President, the disparity between American prices and world prices continues to be a source of loss to American producers and wage earners. So long as the United States has underpaid farmers, and 9,000,000 unemployed, we cannot afford to give our markets to foreign producers. Our markets are the best in the world; they are a prize; they belong to the people who have developed them—the American people—and our farmers, workers, manufacturers, and investors should have the first claim upon them. This is a sane point of view. It is the accepted point of view of every trading nation in the world. It is a point of view which we must maintain or go down in defeat before the hit-and-run attack of low-wage-scale foreign competitors who are using the idealism of peace-minded internationalism to plunder the American markets at the expense of every man, woman, and child in our land.

Secretary Morgenthau has made a proposal which bears upon this issue. He says:

> The best way to reduce our gold inflow on commodity and service account is for us to have full recovery so that our imports will rise more rapidly than do our exports.

Last year the excess of agricultural imports over exports was $462,207,000. If the proposal of the Secretary of the Treasury is to use this gold to pay for imports, it would appear that we have about $12,000,000,000 of excess gold available for that purpose. We have $12,000,000,000 more of commodities than we export. That $12,000,000,000 would be sufficient to pay the wages of 10,000,000 men at an average of $1,200 a year.

Take, for instance, the pottery industry and see how the reciprocal-trade program works. More than 60 percent of the total cost of pottery is the labor cost. The average wage paid in American pottery is 75 cents an hour. The chief competitor in American markets of the American pottery industry is Japan, and the Japanese potter is paid an average wage of 4 cents an hour. How can we expect to keep our potteries going and our potters employed if we insist on reducing the tariff on pottery, as was done in the British trade agreement, a reduction which the Japanse had a right to claim and which they quickly did claim?

Or consider, again, the operation of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in regard to fuel oil. Recently a trade agreement was negotiated with Venezuela by the terms of which the excise tax of one-half cent a gallon on fuel oil was reduced to one-fourth cent a gallon. Fuel oil has been and is perhaps the greatest competitor of all the other fuels. This arrangement has the damaging effect of driving down the price of American-produced oil. This results in displacing millions of tons of American-produced coal, throwing thousands of coal miners out of jobs, and keeping the coal industry in poverty. This is a condition of grave importance to the State of Pennsylvania. It is equally of importance to many sister States where coal miners are now having a desperate struggle for existence.

The hearings of the Senate Committee on Finance show that during the negotiation of the Venezuelan agreement no opportunity was given the independent oil producers of this country to present to the negotiators their facts about excise taxes. The representatives of the Independent Petroleum Association were referred to a committee. That committee was unwilling to give information as to whether or not petroleum was to be considered in the formulation of the agreement. No light whatever was thrown on the plans of the State Department. The names of those who were engaged in the actual negotiations were withheld. It was impossible to learn whether or not anyone was supporting the inclusion of excise taxes, although Congress had made definitely clear its intent that the authority to reduce tariffs should not apply to these excise taxes.

It was only when the conclusion of the Venezuelan agreement was announced that the representatives of the independent petroleum producers learned that the State Department had granted the 50-percent reduction in these taxes on an amount of imports not more than 5 percent of the domestic refinery runs in the preceding year. They then asked the President for an opportunity to be heard, but no such opportunity was granted.

That Congress intended to reserve to itself authority over these excise taxes was expressed in the records of congressional action on the original Trade Agreements Act. I quote the identical language of the report of the House Ways and Means Committee on the act of 1934, which said:

> In order that the necessary reciprocity may be accorded, the President is empowered to promise that existing duties which affect imported goods will not be increased during the term of any particular agreement. It should be carefully noted, however, that the President is given no right to reduce or increase any excise duty. His power of reduction of duties is limited to those which are in fact customs duties.

That portion of the Venezuelan trade agreement which deals with petroleum excise taxes is not in harmony with the intent and purposes of the act. The benefits flowing from this excise-tax reduction do not go to Venezuela, but go to the European or American companies which hold Venezuela's oil. The agreement, therefore, so far as this portion of it is concerned, is an agreement between the State Department acting for the Nation, on one side, and the big importing oil companies on the other.

Mr. President, this oil agreement reminds me of a very great, noble, and distinguished Democrat who, speaking at a Democratic national convention, said, "Show me an oil well, and I will show you a Republican policy." I say to you today, "Show me an oil well in connection with this Venezuelan trade treaty, and I will show you a free-trade Democratic policy."

Factory-wage rates and finished-goods prices have been artificially lifted far above the prices of farm products. As a result, the purchasing power of the farmer has been severely reduced. When the farmer is not able to buy, there is an inevitable reduction in factory sales and factory employment. I have been saying for years that fat farms make full factories. Depressed factory sales mean unemployment in our great industrial centers. That means less demand for farm products. With a depressed industry and mass unemployment comes a drying up of job opportunities. When unemployment is bad, we have additional problems of relief and work relief. This calls for a vast spending program on the part of the Government. This, in turn, means large deficits and increased borrowing or taxes. As long as farm prices are so greatly out of line with industrial costs and prices, we shall have this problem. The answer to it is in the field of economics, and no amount of political juggling will solve it.

In the field of foreign trade we are faced with a similar condition, but one which is worse and much more confusing. Again it is a matter of labor costs and industrial prices. These are expressed in terms of ever-changing currencies. Our Government is giving away the American market to traders who shuffle around their currencies for their own advantage. Their standards of living, prices, and wages are so much lower than our own that we always take a licking. These are economic realities. Unfortunately, however, they are ignored by Utopian-minded idealists and theorists who insist that by playing Santa Claus the United States can bring peace in the world. We have had the reciprocal trade agreements program for 6 years, but it did not bring peace; nor does it have power to restore peace at the present time.

Some persons advocate the importation of foreign coal so that consumers in this country may have cheaper coal. They seem to forget, however, that in order to compete with foreign prices American miners would have to submit to servitude and economic slavery. To have that cheaper coal we would sacrifice more than a proportionate share of the miners' purchasing power. The importation of 6,188,000 tons of coal during the past 9 years has deprived our miners of the right to produce that amount. This has reflected in the loss of wages and returns to workers and operators; and this has occurred at a time when the bituminous and anthracite industries have been crying aloud for relief for their depressed condition. One merely has to ride through some of the coal towns of Pennsylvania and West Virginia to realize that they are truly becoming ghost towns. Everybody in America loses when that happens. Since we must import goods to pay for our exports, let us not import coal, but only goods incapable of being produced here.

To those who urge tearing down our protective-tariff barriers and throwing trade open to indiscriminate free trade, let me say that their proposal comes about 175 years too late. They should have been around in the era when our industries had not been developed. Then, however, for purposes of home defense, and to remove strife with Great Britain and other countries, we encouraged and protected our industries so as to permit them to thrive and develop. When we assumed the responsibility for encouraging infant industries, we also assumed the future responsibility of maintaining adequate protection for them. That which has been built up through the years cannot be undone in a year or a dozen years without undermining and destroying our established economy.

Our high standard of living and our high wages have been built upon the present system of tariff protection, inadequate as it is. Our tariff walls have been, and should continue to be, the first line of defense against the encroachments of economic servitude. If we have to compete with foreign costs of production, we shall have to submit to foreign standards of low wages and low standards of living. To this I am unwilling to subscribe. I do not believe the American people are willing to subscribe to it if they fully understand what is wrapped up in the present proposal.

Economic sanity and political principle unite to demand that the representatives of the people in Congress retain the right to review tariff agreements which so vitally affect the maintenance of our economic life and our constitutional form of government.

Mr. President, in the beginning of the present tariff program Secretary Henry Wallace directly suggested that the United States had certain inefficient industries which must be sacrificed on the altar of international trade. He specifically mentioned the lace industry. Since that time the American lace industry has suffered the most extreme difficulties because of the policy adopted. The American lace-manufacturing industry today is working at less than 50 percent of its capacity as a direct result of the operations of the Franco-American Reciprocal Trade Treaty. While our lace industry has been dwindling in output and employment, imports of laces from France have increased up to 33 times the amount entering this country prior to the ratification of the trade treaty. Nine-tenths of the total French output is finding a market in the United States, at prices against which the American lace-manufacturing industry cannot compete. As a result of these increasing imports, there are in the United States more than 5,000 lace workers who have been deprived of their employment. Production by American lace mills at the present time is little more than half that of 1935, the last year prior to the operation of the treaty with France.

The French are naturally jubilant over the advantages gained in this way. French gains are increased by the depreciation of the franc since 1936. The American dollar today buys French lace, in terms of francs, at one-third the cost which prevailed when the treaty was signed. The American lace-manufacturing industry maintains average weekly wages for different operations which range on an average from $20 a week to $55 a week. French wages, operation for operation, average 25 percent and less of the American wage, and all other costs, including investment and continuing overhead costs, are on a similar scale. Despite these differences in the cost of production and wages, and despite the tremendous depreciation in the value of the franc, the State Department has made no move toward either amending or abrogating the reciprocal-trade treaty with France. As a result, American lace workers go unemployed in large numbers.

Mr. President, many of these workers live in Pennsylvania; they are my constituents. I am trying to voice their opposition to the way in which this trade policy has wrecked their industry, and put them out on the street, and forced many of them to go on relief.

Then, Mr. President, there is the pulp and paper industry. Following the trade agreement with the Netherlands, the imports of wrapping paper into our country rose from 5,000 to 24,000 tons the first year. Thirteen thousand tons of it were of the very best grade of wrapping paper. This was machine-glazed paper, and it amounted to some 27 percent of the machine-glazed, highest-grade wrapping paper used here. The result is that this increased import tonnage actually meant that the wrapping-paper industry for a period of time was operating at below cost. This is but one small segment of the American paper industry. The same kind of losses are being sustained in other fields of the same industry.

The peculiar conditions in this industry, particularly in analyzing tariffs, should be given consideration. Normally, at congressional hearings all sides of a question are permitted to be expressed. Without hearings injustice is bound to occur, and against this star-chamber procedure the representatives of small industries have no recourse whatsoever. They take losses which place them in jeopardy, and increase the ever-growing number of the unemployed in sectors of business which normally should offer the greatest opportunity to provide new employment.

The labor movement is destroyed in most of the countries of the world. If the war shall continue for a few years, what is left of the labor movement in the European countries will be destroyed there also. This will mean that the markets of the world will be drawn down, and cheap labor will be forced upon organized labor, and will be used against it. Economic conditions in the United States will feel the repercussions of this economic warfare long after the shot and shell have been forgotten.

Recently I received a letter from a very prominent labor leader in Britain who said that if the war continues he expects Europe to be reduced to pestilence and famine. Under these conditions the United States will need to take strong measures to uphold our American standards of living, or they will be overwhelmed in the deluge of world troubles about which we are not able to do much in a constructive way at the present time. Our best service to the rest of the world should continue to be to demonstrate the practical value of high work and wage standards, and this we cannot continue to do unless we uphold the basic economic standards on which our present work structure has been built.

These trade treaties are referred to as reciprocal-trade treaties. The fact is that we have made duty reductions which are almost world-wide in their application, whereas the reductions which have been promised in return are restricted to the countries making direct agreements with us. Only if other countries should make treaties among themselves all around, and not with us, would we receive free benefits from other countries as they are now receiving them from us. In other countries, however, such agreements are not being made; and, as a result, we are in the position of giving away our market to many countries which do not directly participate in our trade negotiations. This is a means of lowering our duties in general, but it is not reciprocity.

Mr. President, the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act does not pretend to lay down any basis for determining on what grounds concessions in duties may be made. It becomes obvious that differences between costs of production of an article in the United States and those in competing foreign countries are not of any importance to those who negotiate these agreements. With the greatly increased costs of wages and the shortened hours of labor in this country, naturally a producer in the United States must be greatly concerned if the tariff protection on the articles he produces is not sufficient to equalize the difference between costs of production.

Take, for example, the plate-glass industry, which is a very important industry in Pennsylvania. Half the window-glass factories of this country were compelled to close down in the period between 1932 and 1936, yet every box of window glass that is imported and sold here consists of merchandise which could be readily produced by the domestic industry, which has the capacity to produce from eighteen to twenty million boxes of glass a year. At no time has the industry been able to market a quantity in excess of 12,000,000 boxes, yet we still continue to import from abroad.

Compare wage schedules of window-glass workers in foreign countries with our own. In Czechoslovakia at the end of 1935 an ordinary gas producer operator received 17 cents an hour, while here he received 64 cents an hour. At the close of 1937 a Belgian glass worker received 19 cents an hour, while we were paying 72 cents for the same work. These are differentials which cannot be ignored without throwing thousands of American workers out of jobs. Foreign labor in the glass industry is paid a pittance of what our labor is paid. Foreign labor works incomparably longer hours. Foreign labor works under standards of living we would regard as criminally insufficient. Why should we uplift our American standards of wages and hours through domestic legislation and at the same time undermine those standards through the further enactment of legislation which strikes straight at the heart of American labor?

Mr. President, the lot of the dairyman is placed in jeopardy under the present program. There are many dairymen in Pennsylvania, and my attention has especially been called to their protests against the way in which the reciprocal-trade policy is being administered. Dairying is not like a great many agricultural industries, such as the production of cotton, wheat, and tobacco. Dairying is still a domestic industry. Our total farm production of milk is something over 100,000,000,000 pounds. About half of this amount, or a little more, is manufactured into butter or cheese or evaporated cream. This milk is produced under sanitary standards immeasurably higher than those which prevail in the greater part of the rest of the world. We are practically free from tuberculosis, and yet we allow the dairy products from foreign countries to come into our country without any sanitary standard at all. I am informed that 50 percent of the cows in England, for example, have tuberculosis, and that tuberculosis is rampant all through the western European nations with the exception of the Scandinavian countries. In the course of 23 years the Federal, State, and county governments have expended more than $260,000,000 to control bovine tuberculosis here; yet as the trade agreements are now administered our Nation has no protection from the ravages of this dread disease from abroad because of uncontrolled imports of milk products from disease-ridden areas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement about the existence of tuberculosis in England among cattle. Has the Senator statistics to show what our butter and milk imports from England amounted to last year?

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator will find the statistics in the hearings. I shall be glad to gather them and give the information to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the Senator had them at his fingertips.

Mr. DAVIS. No; I do not have them at my fingertips.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD as part of my remarks an extract from the minutes of the meeting of the Philadelphia Board of Trade held February 19, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
Bourse Building, Philadelphia.

EXTRACT FROM MINUTES OF STATED MEETING, PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE, HELD FEBRUARY 19, 1940

Your committee having considered House Joint Resolution 407, being a bill proposing further extension of the Trade Treaty Act, and for other purposes, respectfully represents:

It is needless to recite that our onetime industrial prosperity, the healthful competition prevailing in our domestic as well as our export markets, was justifiably attributed to the successful application of our protective tariff—the McKinley tariff. As sponsor for his initial tariff bill Mr. McKinley declared: "The end in view is always to be opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people but tend rather to increase their employment."

Therefore emphasis should be placed upon the fact that under the Hull-Roosevelt reciprocal trade treaty policy the current administration has flouted both the Constitution of the United States and the fundamentals of that reciprocity McKinley defined; it has effected drastic concession on foreign products, both farm and factory, which we ourselves produce; it has thus gratuitously extended such concessions virtually to all countries of the world, except Germany, without securing to our export trade any equivalent in reciprocal advantages.

Thus practicing a strange internationalism (styled the "good neighbor policy") this camouflaging of a drastically downward revision of the tariff is exposing our farms and factories to a ruthless foreign competition, the evidence of which fact will become the more obvious with the return of peace in Europe. Then it may naturally be expected that swords will be beaten into plowshares and the millions of men now in the trenches will have returned to their workbenches.

Proponents of this program now couch their appeal for its further extension in a spirit of philanthropy. They propose that by this means we shall assure peace throughout the world; by thus stimulating trade between nations we will inspire gainful employment among the peoples of the earth and so advance the cause of a common humanity.

For reasons hereinbefore cited, your committee recommends emphatic opposition to any further extension of the Trade Treaty Act as submitted in House Joint Resolution 407. The report was unanimously adopted.

THE PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
GEO. L. MARKLAND, JR., President.

True copy.
Attest:

H. W. WILLS, Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to conclude by repeating that I am wholeheartedly in favor of the Pittman amendment. In view of the conditions I have recited, I am opposed to the continuation of an administrative policy of foreign trade that does not give first consideration to the welfare of American workers, farmers, business, and the purchasing public. We have had a sufficiently long experience with this program to see what it has produced and can produce. I am not opposed to foreign trade, I am not opposed to reciprocal trade, but I am opposed and shall continue to be opposed to any policy that ignores the rights of our own citizens and makes them subservient to the low-wage and cutthroat competitive policies of any foreign power, for I hold it to be our first duty to maintain our American standards of work and wages.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT JUDGES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I understand it is not expected that any further speeches will be made in respect to the pending legislation at this time. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the pending business be laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7079, to provide for the appointment of additional district and circuit judges, which is Calendar No. 1377.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the bill for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7079) to provide for the appointment of additional district and circuit judges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional circuit judges, as follows:

(a) One for the sixth circuit;

(b) One for the eighth circuit.

SEC. 2. The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, six additional district judges, as follows:

(a) One for each of the following districts: Southern district of California, district of New Jersey, western district of Oklahoma, eastern district of Pennsylvania;

(b) One for the southern district of New York;

(c) One, who shall be a district judge for the northern and southern districts of Florida.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, that is the amendment which I asked to have considered.

I think I should make a statement with respect to the matter before action is taken. I propose to offer a certain amendment to the substitute amendment. This measure is a House bill. Last year the Senate passed a bill creating certain additional judgeships, which went to the House but was not acted upon. At this session the House enacted its own bill, and it was sent to the Senate. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary struck out all in the House bill after the enacting clause, and inserted in lieu of the House provision the identical bill which the Senate passed at the last session.

Since the bill to which I have referred was passed by the Senate at the last session, there have been certain developments which would suggest that the original Senate bill, now proposed as a substitute, be changed. For instance, the Senate bill and the House bill provide for an additional judge for the sixth circuit. We are informed that conditions have changed considerably since that provision was made.

At the judicial conference the judges of that district were of the opinion that an additional judge was not needed there. Therefore, in order that that question may go to conference, which it could not do without amendment, because both bills contain the provision for such judge, I ask that on page 2, line 9, the provision for an additional judge in the sixth circuit be stricken out.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that he is moving to strike from the Senate bill, which he seeks to substitute for the bill which passed the House, provision for an additional judge for the sixth circuit?

Mr. HATCH. Yes. There is a question whether that judgeship is needed. The provision is included in both the House and the Senate bills, and unless it is stricken out there will be nothing to confer about. We wish to look further into the question. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. The need for that judge was looked into at the last session and the judgeship was included in the Senate bill. The same provision having passed both Houses, although in separate bills, it would be rather difficult to explain to the people of that circuit why it is now desired to strike out the judgeship for the sixth circuit. I did not understand that that was to be done, or I might not have given my consent.

Mr. HATCH. I should have told the Senator that. I overlooked the fact that the Senator comes from the sixth circuit. If the Senator wishes to have the matter go over, I shall have no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to see the provision for that circuit judgeship stricken out. It has been passed on by both the House and the Senate, although in separate bills.

Mr. HATCH. The reason for my statement was that representations were made to me this week that the judicial conference at its last session came to the conclusion that the judges of that circuit were rapidly catching up with their work, which was not true a year ago; and it was their opinion that it was not necessary to have that judge included in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have talked with at least one of the judges of that circuit, and certainly his opinion does not coincide with that view. I know that the district bar and the bench itself have expected that the House would act on the bill, as it was passed by the Senate. Now, that it has passed its own bill, as it sometimes does, whether through caprice

I do not know or say, it would be quite strange and quite a disappointment to the people of that circuit to strike the judgeship out at this time.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator is quite correct. The provision is now in both the House bill and the Senate bill, and my reason for suggesting that it be stricken from the Senate bill is that the matter may be considered in conference. If this action is not taken, it will leave the provision for the judgeship in the legislation, and there will be nothing about which to confer.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not like to consent to that without some further knowledge of the situation. I did not have the slightest information that anything like this would happen. The people of that circuit have been looking forward to the enactment of this law, and I know the judges feel, unless they have changed their minds, that another judge is needed. I hope the Senator will not eliminate that provision.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have no objection to letting the matter go over and the Senator can investigate further.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have not been able to follow the discussion. I should like to inquire if the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been agreed to. The Senator from New Mexico called up House bill 7079 and asked for its present consideration. He then asked to amend the committee amendment by striking out line 9 on page 2, which provides for a judge for the sixth circuit. The Senator from Kentucky has objected to that, and the Chair has not been able to follow the colloquy back and forth between the Senators.

Mr. HATCH. I may say to the Senator from Vermont that the sixth circuit is the circuit in which the Senator from Kentucky resides. Personally I would not want to strike the judgeship from the bill now, especially until the Senator from Kentucky has had full opportunity to advise himself as to the conditions in that circuit at this time.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Since we acted as a committee on this matter, I have had additional and new information which leads me to change my opinion about this judgeship. I would not feel justified in passing the bill with that judgeship in it, certainly not without a clear knowledge by the Senate of the new circumstances. So I suggest that the matter go over until the majority leader has had an opportunity to make further investigation.

Mr. HATCH. Very well. I think that should be done. I withdraw my request for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico withdraws his request for consideration of House bill 7079, and, without objection, the bill will be returned to the calendar.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the fact that I reside in that circuit is no reason for including a new judge merely because I happen to be in favor of it. However, the procedure strikes me as a little strange. A bill is passed by both the House and the Senate after hearings by both the House and Senate committees, and only within the past day or two the Senate committee reports a bill with a judgeship in it for the sixth circuit. Now we are asked to eliminate the judgeship, which has been in both bills. I am at least curious to know what additional facts have been developed in the past day or two which make it unnecessary to provide the judgeship for the sixth circuit, when a year ago the Senate passed a bill providing for the additional judge, and the House has done likewise, and the Senate committee has approved such a bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that so far as I know nothing sensational has happened. I made reference to the Senator's residence in the circuit merely because I think a Senator who resides in a circuit should be consulted. He has information about affairs in the circuit which other Senators do not have. My only purpose in asking that the provision be stricken out was that then the matter could go to conference. I am not altogether convinced one way or the other about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the House had passed the Senate bill instead of passing its own bill, the matter would not be in conference. The judgeship would have been established. The mere fact that the House saw fit to ignore the Senate bill and pass a practically identical bill of its own and send it to the Senate does not seem to me to give good reason for eliminating the judgeship, to which both Houses have agreed.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield the floor. I have no desire to discuss the matter further, but I am a little surprised.

FINANCIAL AND OTHER DATA PERTAINING TO SUNDRY GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES AND CORPORATIONS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 247, submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] on March 19, 1940, authorizing printing as a Senate document the report of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the financial condition and operation of certain corporations and agencies of the Government; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "document", to strike out the comma and the words "and that —— additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate Document Room."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the financial condition and operations of certain corporations and agencies of the Government, transmitted to the Senate on February 15, 1940, in response to Senate Resolution 150, agreed to June 27, 1939, be printed as a Senate document.

PRINTING OF MONOGRAPHS ON ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 248, submitted by me on March 21, 1940, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can very briefly explain the resolution.

Mr. KING. I understand what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. This resolution does not cover all the work that is to be done. There will be another resolution, and we shall be very glad to include in it anything the Senator wishes to include. The reports on the group of activities studied by the Attorney General's office have been finished; but the work is still going on, and there will be another document.

Mr. KING. I am familiar with the situation; but I should like to have the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The resolution will be passed over.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON SILVER

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Concurrent Resolution 41, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Con. Res. 41) submitted by Mr. PITTMAN on March 22, 1940, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2, of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Special Committee on the Investigation of Silver, United States Senate, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to have printed in one volume for its use, 1,500 additional copies of the hearings held before said committee pursuant to the resolution (S. Res. No. 187, 74th Cong., 1st sess.) authorizing a special committee of the Senate to investigate the administration, and the economic and commercial effect, of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 25, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we praise Thee that while treason revolted against truth and nailed it to a cross, we behold in our glorified Lord the triumph of love over hate, of right over wrong and of life over death. We earnestly pray that the Christ may be unto us a living crucible in which all our sins are burned away; keep us ever conscious that the worst thing for us to forget is that we are sinners. Lord God of the nations, we pray for peace to come when war, woe, and mockery shall be swept from the face of the earth and it shall rest like a heavenly benediction upon its troubled mind with its heavy heart. O let the new age come, the new life, the new progress, and the new joy. Grant that everything good may come to our President, our Speaker, and every Member, officer, and employee of the Congress; may all the hushed voices of the human heart bless our homes and Thine shall be the glory forever, through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, March 21, 1940, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title: H. R. 8202, a bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. SMITH, Mr. NYE, and Mr. MCNARY to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the House, I urge your cooperation and support of H. R. 9065, which I have introduced for amendments to the existing W. P. A. law. This is a timely bill, and your immediate consideration and favorable action is urged. Not only my district and State but every State in the Union will derive great benefits from provisions of this bill.

The bill would repeal the 25-percent contribution by sponsors of W. P. A. projects. In many places in my district local sponsors, including county and city, are unable to obtain funds to put up the 25 percent for worthy projects. This inability of local sponsors to meet the requirements is curtailing the operation of the W. P. A. program and throwing needy persons out of employment. The sewing-room projects in my district have probably been hit harder than any others.

The various counties are absolutely unable to meet the local sponsorship requirements. Some counties, for the reason that the required funds were not set up in the Budget, and, of course, in some counties they are not financially able to bear additional tax for these funds. The result is that the sewing-room employees are the sufferers. There are also large numbers of other worthy and timely projects which have had to be stopped or, in fact, not embarked upon on account of this drastic requirement. Our local city and county officials are doing all that they can to meet these requirements, but there is a limit to money-raising abilities of these financial units, and the result is that our needy persons are being furloughed from W. P. A. and at the same time the city or county is needing the improvements which could be had.

REPEAL 18 MONTHS' LAY-OFF

Another provision of the bill which I have introduced is for the repeal of the required furlough after 18 months' continuous W. P. A. employment. This 18 months' provision has worked a severe hardship upon thousands of W. P. A. employees in my State. It should be repealed and I hope you will help me to do it. The W. P. A. administration itself is in a position to judge the relative needs of W. P. A. employees, and these officials furlough those who are able to find employment with industry. Time is lost and needless funds expended for reexamining and reemploying those who are furloughed. Frequently operations of projects are crippled on account of wholesale 18-month-provision furloughs. Also a provision of the bill which I would have you support is one to have the Federal Government give 50–50 in the expense in certifying W. P. A. workers. Some of the States are not financially able to pay employees to do investigating and certifying work. In my own State for many months we were without any certification office; during this period thousands of needy persons who were eligible to get certified were kept off W. P. A. projects, even when we had W. P. A. funds to employ them with. In fact, when we have certifying agencies, needy persons have to run through red tape from 2 weeks to 3 or 4 months trying to get certified. This is a needless situation and a preventable injury to the needy in my State. In some cases, if it were not for the help of charity and relatives, people would go hungry and die of starvation while they are waiting for certification. If the Government will put 50 percent to pay certifying officials and then cut off some of the red tape and foolishness in certification, W. P. A. will be able to take care of the relief which it was intended to.

Another requirement which is altogether unnecessary and impossible is the past-work-history requirement. This should be abolished. In my State, of course, there is very little industrial employment. It is, as in the past, impossible for many of the most needy persons to have had a work history. How can people be expected to have a work history when there has been no gainful employment for them to be engaged in? This requirement has been a serious handicap, especially to the women who have always kept their own homes and occupied the role of housewife and also to the young women who have not been able to find any employment this requirement is unfair and should be abolished.

EQUAL WAGES FOR ALL PARTS OF COUNTRY

This bill also provides for payment of equal wages for similar work in all parts of the United States. There is no justice in paying $35.10 for labor in my congressional district and paying for the same kind of labor in a district, say in New York, the amount of $55 per month. People get just as hungry in Florida or Georgia as they do in Massachusetts,

New York, or Michigan. The Federal Government pays to regular Federal employees the same amount of money in all parts of the United States. For instance, postmasters or rural carriers in Alabama draw the same amount of money for their services per mile as a rural carrier in New Jersey or Wisconsin. This difference in wages paid under W. P. A. law in different parts of the country is an abomination, is un-American and should be instantly changed. I have worked for every wage raise Florida W. P. A. workers have had, and shall keep up the fight until equality is obtained.

Thousands of the very best people in my State are now working with W. P. A.—financial reverses, sickness, and destitution are respectors of no persons. Men who have been wealthy and financially secure have in many instances been forced to work on W. P. A. in order to make an honest living for themselves and families. W. P. A. employees of my district are honorable and upright citizens and appreciate and support our Government as strongly as any group in the country. They are entitled to adequate pay and security.

There are other provisions of the bill which I shall not go into.

LARGER APPROPRIATION NEEDED NEXT YEAR

I take this opportunity to also urge my colleagues to vote for an adequate W. P. A. appropriation for next year. In fact, the funds provided for this year were not at all adequate.

The W. P. A. is now faced with a drastic cut of W. P. A. employees on account of scarcity of funds. I believe that $1,477,000,000 was appropriated for this year, and in spite of this it is estimated that 800,000 W. P. A. workers will have to be dropped from the pay rolls by June 30. This will hit my State by a lay-off of 6,500. The fact is, in my State we still have a large number of needy people who are anxious to get on W. P. A. in order to support themselves and families. There is some talk in higher circles of reducing W. P. A. appropriation to $1,125,000,000 for next year. If this is done, W. P. A. will have to furlough an additional 600,000 after July 1. This number added to the 800,000 now being furloughed would give 1,400,000 less jobs on W. P. A. next year than we have this year.

VOTED AGAINST 18-MONTH PROVISION

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is going to become of these needy people if the Government drastically cuts the appropriation for next year? Instead of cutting the appropriation, I urge that the appropriation be increased over the amount spent this year. At the last session of Congress I voted against the reduction in the appropriation, and I voted against the 18-month lay-off provision. I shall support amendments to increase the appropriation next year if the amount recommended is equal to or less than the amount used this year.

The W. P. A. is one of the most helpful departments of our Government. It has given employment to millions of needy people. It has, in fact, made possible to a large degree the general increases in business activities which our country has experienced in the last 4 or 5 years. In my own district, before we embarked upon the relief program hundreds of business houses, including stores, closed their doors. Today there are very few vacant store buildings. In many towns in my district the W. P. A. pay roll has probably done more to keep businesses going and thriving than any other funds. The W. P. A. employee likewise has through his earnings been able to pay his grocery bill, his doctor bill, his drug-store bill, and to buy clothing and other supplies so desperately needed by his family.

In addition to the work relief, help, and support which W. P. A. has carried to millions of our people, the American people have received in return not only increases in business and general wealth but substantial improvements which will last for generations.

PERMANENT AND NEEDED BUILDINGS

In my own State about 725 new public buildings have been erected, 532 improved, and 75 have had additions made to them; 180 of these new buildings are school buildings; 277 schools have been improved; 42 have had new additions; in other words, 500 school buildings have either been remodeled or rebuilt from the ground up. Some of these magnificent new structures are in some small school rural areas where heretofore nothing but rambling shacks existed. The small barefoot boy in the most remote district is entitled to the same comforts and educational conveniences as his city-dwelling brother. The Government has recognized this and is using the W. P. A. as the medium to take to these areas modern and magnificent buildings; 266 recreational buildings have been erected, 36 offices and administrative structures, and improvements made to 33 additional structures; 10 or 12 new hospitals. One of the greatest benefits to carry to the people of our Nation would be a hospital to each county where needed. A number of counties in my congressional district are without any hospital and hardly any county in the district realizes adequate hospital facilities. I desire to see each county in my district have at least one hospital. At present the only hope for this is through W. P. A. W. P. A. has constructed in Florida 10 or 12 armories for the Florida National Guard. My home town has one of these modern and substantial armory buildings. In architecture, construction, material, and adaptability to service, it is a glowing example of real Federal achievement. I doubt if it could be replaced for twice the money from any other source except W. P. A.

Courthouses, city halls, streets, sidewalks, sewers, water mains, deep-water wells, storage tanks, and countless other lasting improvements have been accomplished. W. P. A. has in its Florida health program drained 387,285 acres of land. With these and other sanitary projects, it is doing a great deal toward eradicating malaria and other diseases. The sewing-room projects have produced probably 3,000,000 garments, while the lunchroom projects have provided probably 1,000,000 hot lunches for hungry and needy little school children.

FIFTY PERCENT OF W. P. A. FUNDS SPENT ON ROADS

W. P. A. has expended in Florida almost 50 percent of all W. P. A. funds in the construction of highways, streets, and roads. These roads are a medium of transportation in bringing farm produce to the market and taking school children to consolidated schools, and, in fact, improving in every way the social and economic life in our State; 4,156 miles of such roads have been built in Florida. About 73 percent of all roads constructed by W. P. A. in Florida has been on lateral roads connecting up major highway systems; 864 new bridges and viaducts have been built in Florida by W. P. A.; 19 of these structures are steel and 34 of masonry types and the remainder are wooden structures.

W. P. A. SHOULD BUILD R. E. A. LINES

W. P. A. has assisted in building and rebuilding city-owned power plants. It is through W. P. A. projects that rural electrification could be carried to practically every farm in the United States.

I hope that arrangements will be made whereby W. P. A. laborers can be used for R. E. A. projects. No more important or lasting benefits could be given through any W. P. A. work than this.

I receive letters daily from individuals and towns and cities expressing their approval and appreciation, such as the following:

Hon. LEX GREEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GREEN: It is a genuine pleasure, as president of the town council of the town of Madison, Fla., for me to write you on behalf of the entire council and express our appreciation of your efforts directed toward retaining the W. P. A. office in Madison, in response to our recent urgent request.

The W. P. A. office means a great deal to this community, and your prompt, willing action in championing our cause, together with the favorable result accomplished, is indeed gratifying to all of us.

Respectfully yours,

C. S. BLALOCK,
President, Town Council.

Time will not permit me to enumerate all the lasting and permanent improvements brought about through W. P. A. in my State. I have voted for all of these W. P. A. funds, and frankly feel proud for the business-like achievements of the W. P. A. program in my State. It is true that some funds possibly have been wasted. It is true that some persons on W. P. A. should not be there, and others who are not on W. P. A. are in dire need. These matters, however, are problems of the administration and it is confidently hoped that W. P. A. will grow more and more efficient and more and more for the relief of those in actual need.

I shall continue my support for W. P. A. appropriations, and shall defend its splendid accomplishments. During the past 4½ years about $110,000,000 has been expended in my State by W. P. A. This included, of course, Federal funds and sponsors' contributions. From eighty to ninety million dollars of Federal funds have been expended—these funds representing the economic life blood of my State and without these funds bankruptcy and also hunger and need would have been the lot of thousands in my State.

GOLD AND ITS POWER. PART 3

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have taken this opportunity to call the attention of the House to a resolution which I presume will soon be introduced, and in which Congress will be requested to set up an inter-American bank by a special act of Congress. It is also my desire to remind the Members of the House that the people of this great Nation have not delegated power to Congress in the Constitution for the enactment of this or similar types of legislation.

I sincerely hope that every Member of the House and Senate will read the third preliminary draft of convention relating to the inter-American bank, which may be found on pages 2066–2069 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 27, 1940. I particularly call your attention to the third draft of charter of the inter-American bank, which you will find on page 2067, for it is that resolution which will be presented here in the House and which you will be expected to pass to please that invisible power which has been guiding this administration and this great Nation to destruction for the past 27 years.

It is important that you study these three documents very, very carefully, for you will, if you vote for the charter of this bank, not only violate your oath of obligation but you will, by such act, betray your own people. The Members of this House and the Senate are not elected to follow political leaders, House leaders, or the President of the United States. The Members are elected to follow the Constitution of the United States and to represent the people of this Nation in Congress assembled.

The membership of both Houses are now the direct representatives of the people, and surely are sufficiently intelligent to read and understand the Constitution of the United States as it is written, and not as it may be interpreted by some absent-minded Justice of the Supreme Court. The Members who do not understand it should resign and go home, for enactment of unconstitutional legislation can only terminate in disintegration and in the destruction of our Government.

The resolution to create an inter-American bank which the internationalists want Congress to pass is clearly unconstitutional, and should, when the people of this Nation understand it, defeat every Member who votes for the charter of an inter-American bank. I now quote the charter:

FEBRUARY 6, 1940.

Third draft of charter of the Inter-American Bank. (Such charter would be granted by an act of the Congress of the United States of America)

SECTION 1. There is hereby created a body corporate with the name "Inter-American Bank," hereinafter referred to as "the bank."

SEC. 2. The structure, operations, and activities of the bank shall be as defined by the bylaws, which are annexed to the convention relating to the establishment of the bank. The bank shall have all incidental powers necessary and proper to carry out the powers now or hereafter expressly authorized herein or in the bylaws of the bank.

SEC. 3. The bank may begin operations when at least a total of 110 shares of stock of the bank are subscribed for by at least five governments which have also deposited their ratifications of the aforementioned convention with the Pan American Union.

SEC. 4. The bank shall have succession for a period of 20 years from the date of enactment hereof or until such earlier time as it shall be lawfully dissolved. The United States agrees not to repeal or amend this charter except upon the request of the bank pursuant to a four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors of the bank. The United States may extend the charter for additional 20-year periods upon the request of the bank pursuant to a four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors of the bank.

SEC. 5. Amendments to the bylaws of the bank, consistent with the aforementioned convention, this charter, and the purposes of the bank as now set out in article 5–A of the bylaws of the bank, may be adopted by the bank pursuant to a four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors: Provided, however, That article 5–A of the bylaws may not be amended: And provided further, That the provisions in such bylaws relating to the effect and manner of the making of a timely objection by a participating government may not be amended except by a unanimous vote of the representatives of all the participating governments.

SEC. 6. The bank shall have power to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal, and to make such contracts and to acquire, own, hold, or dispose of such real and personal property as may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

SEC. 7. The bank may sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction. Any civil suit at law or at equity, brought within the United States, its Territories, and possessions to which the bank shall be a party shall be deemed to arise under the laws of the United States, and the district courts of the United States shall have original jurisdiction of all such suits; and the bank, in any such suit, may, at any time before trial thereof, remove such suit into the district court of the United States for the proper district by following the procedure for the removal of causes otherwise provided by law.

I do not believe there are enough clowns in the South American governments to perform in the ring of this international circus, or dupes to fall into this financial trap. It should be clear to all governments that the inter-American bank is an offspring of the League of Nations Bank of International Settlement.

We, the people of the Western Hemisphere, should be cognizant of the fact that the inter-American bank is another attempt at world domination through the power of gold. To be sure, it is very subtle. The creation of a bank appears to be harmless; yet the creation of the inter-American bank by the Congress of the United States is tantamount to bestowing the title to gold in the invisible government, who in the end will be final owners of this bank.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now highlight each section of the charter of the inter-American bank.

In section 1 of the charter Congress will create, if the resolution is passed, an inter-American bank, which will prove to be destructive to our own industries, agriculture, and labor.

In section 2 Congress will, if the charter is granted, bestow greater power on this bank than that now delegated to Congress, for this bank will, by wielding the power of gold, control the export and import trade of the Western Hemisphere and nations beyond the two oceans.

In section 3 Congress grants permission to the bank to begin operation with 110 shares of the 1,000 of the first issue. This, if nothing else, shows how anxious this crowd of international highbinders is to obtain congressional authorization for the bank. They are extremely impatient for this charter, for, if it is granted, these international shylocks will have the legal right to fleece the people of the United States, South America and Central America, and Mexico.

In section 4 Congress obligates the United States to extend life to the bank for a period of 20 years, and in addition to that agrees not to repeal or amend the charter of the bank except by permission of four-fifths majority vote of the bank's board of directors. The directors of this bank are indeed magnanimous, for they grant permission to the United States to extend the charter another 20 years or more, provided four-fifths of the board desire such extension. In other words, Congress will, in enacting this legislation, create and crown a monetary king for the Western Hemisphere.

It is further provided that article 5–A of the bylaws may not be amended, and the part which relates to timely objections only by unanimous consent. This provision of the bylaws is interesting, as it clarifies the power of our own Constitution, which provides:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government * * * and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

It should be clear that this provision of the Constitution cannot be amended by three-fourths majority vote, but must, like article 5A of the bylaws of the bank, remain indestructible until amended by unanimous vote, a principle which we ignored in 1913 when we adopted the seventeenth amendment, which destroyed the fundamental principles of this Republic.

In section 6 Congress grants to the bank the power to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal, and to make such contracts as it wishes, including the power "to trade, buy, and sell all kinds of property," including silver and other precious metals. This tribe, while making this provision for themselves, namely, ownership of gold and gold money and other precious metals, expects us, the real owners of gold money, to be satisfied with an inflated hocus-pocus dollar.

In section 7 Congress will, if it enacts this legislation, satisfy a dream long held by the internationalist, for legal power will be given him to operate a bank free from restriction, without taxation, and on capital or money appropriated from the United States Treasury, which is the property of our own people.

If Congress should be stupid enough to enact this legislation, it will, in fact, amend that part of article 3, section 2, which gives the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in all "cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state—foreign state—shall be party," for this section in the bylaws of the bank gives original jurisdiction of all suits to district courts. I therefore advise Members of Congress to give this legislation serious consideration and note particularly the manner in which it will disadvantageously affect the people at home who sent you to Congress to protect their rights.

It is also well to bear in mind that should any of us in an apathetic moment grant this charter we will in such legislation create an international corporation of such far-reaching magnitude that it may even destroy our national banks, industries, and business. When anyone is authorized by Congress to sign the articles of convention, he actually signs a treaty which obligates the United States without further consideration for $5,000,000 in gold and, in addition to that, compliance with all the provisions which are set forth in the three documents to which I have referred.

In the first article of the convention, which I advise you all to read, Congress will, if it grants the charter, establish a bank with all the powers proposed in the charter and the bylaws, to engage in all types of activities, and the additional power to enact its own legislation. In other words, you grant this bank the power of an imperial despot, and it will in time wield greater power over the contracting parties than the governments of such nations wield within their own borders.

I have introduced a resolution to stop this international rape on the Western Hemisphere, which I hope the committee will report out so that it may be considered by the House. I also hope that all contracting nations, including ourselves, will think twice before signing the articles of convention, for the signing of it is like signing a treaty and will, if rejected by Congress after having been signed, prove embarrassing to the parents of this illegitimate offspring. I cannot refrain from quoting part of paragraph C, article 2, of the convention, for it is so typical and descriptive of those who are the promoters of this bank:

> C. The bank, its assets, and real and personal property of whatsoever nature, including, without limitation of the foregoing, its charter, capital, reserves, surplus, income, and profits; its activities, transactions and operations, and shares of stock and all notes, debentures, bonds, and other such obligations issued by the bank, including dividends and interest thereon, by whomsoever held, and any remunerations or salaries paid by the bank, and also any individual, partnership, corporation, association, or other entity in its dealings and relations with the bank in any of the foregoing matters, and in its acquisitions, holdings, transfers, or dispositions of any such shares and obligations of the bank, shall be exempt and immune from all taxation by a contracting party or a political subdivision thereof, now or hereafter imposed, and by whatever name described including, without limitation of the foregoing, excises and imposts: Provided, however, That the foregoing shall not be construed as preventing the imposition by a contracting party or any political subdivision thereof of nondiscriminatory taxes upon nationals of such contracting party with respect to any of the foregoing. As used in this paragraph "nationals of such contracting party" shall include any person who is domiciled in, or a citizen or resident of, such contracting party, and shall also include any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or other entity organized under the laws of such contracting party or political subdivision thereof, or having a permanent establishment, such as a branch, office, agency, or other fixed place of business, in the territory of such contracting party, but shall not include the bank. Notwithstanding any of the foregoing, neither a contracting party nor any political subdivision thereof shall impose any tax on or measured by salaries or remunerations paid by the bank to its officers or employees who are citizens of any other contracting party.

I cannot emphasize too strongly careful consideration and study of the articles of convention, the bylaws, and the charter of the inter-American bank, for it is, without doubt, an attempt by the international bankers to gain complete domination and control of gold money. The bank is legally exempt from taxation, and will serve no good to anyone except to the international financiers. They will benefit to the fullest extent, as the western republics furnish a hundred million dollars in gold for working capital, free from taxes, and with little or no responsibility to those who furnish the money. The return on this capital is also provided for, for the bank is, according to its own bylaws, permitted to pay only such dividends as it will, but at no time more than 3 percent.

> E. The board of directors, by a four-fifths majority vote, may declare dividends out of the dividend reserve in surplus of the bank: Provided, however, That total dividends in any one year, including dividends paid pursuant to paragraph D–2 above, shall not be more than 3 percent of the paid-up amount of the stock.
> F. The bank may not be liquidated except by a four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors. Upon liquidation of the bank, and after discharge of all the liabilities of the bank, the assets remaining shall be divided among the shareholders.

A question which should be of interest to Members of Congress, as well as to the people of this Nation, is the source from which South American republics are to obtain the gold to invest in this bank. Is it not possible that the United States will furnish gold for all of them in return for worthless notes? I believe you will agree with me that that is most likely, and particularly in view of the fact that their accounts with the United States are now in default. I quote the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2095, February 28, 1940:

Countries	Total
	Outstanding	In default
Argentina	$233,000,000	$20,000,000
Bolivia	60,000,000	60,000,000
Brazil	356,000,000	356,000,000
Chile	182,000,000	182,000,000
Colombia	146,000,000	143,000,000
Costa Rica	8,000,000	8,000,000
Dominican Republic	15,000,000
Ecuador	12,000,000	12,000,000
El Salvador	12,000,000	12,000,000
Guatemala	5,000,000	3,000,000
Haiti	8,000,000	8,000,000
Mexico	273,000,000	273,000,000
Panama	17,000,000	17,000,000
Peru	85,000,000	85,000,000
Uruguay	56,000,000	56,000,000

This table speaks for itself and should be of particular interest to us, the people of the United States, who are paying interest on these defaulted obligations. It strikes me that the purpose of the inter-American bank is to repay bad loans made by the international bankers to the above republics in somewhat the same manner as defaulted World War obligations were charged up to the taxpayers of the United States.

Take notice that paragraph F provides that, upon liquidation of the bank, the remaining assets shall be divided among the shareholders. The question may be asked, Why not among the contracting parties who furnished the capital or gold dollars for operation of the bank? This appears to be a deliberate fraud, for it is evidently the intention of the directors of the bank to divide the profits, if any, among themselves, and charge the losses to the contracting parties, or maybe to the Treasury of the United States.

I now respectfully call your attention to article 5–A of the bylaws, paragraph B–1, which I quote:

B. In order to carry out the foregoing purposes the bank shall have specific power to:

(1) Make short-term, intermediate, and long-term loans in any currency and in gold or silver to participating governments and to fiscal agencies, central banks, political subdivisions, and nationals thereof; provided that any such loan to such fiscal agency, central bank, political subdivision, and national shall be guaranteed by the government thereof.

You can well imagine how secure these loans will be, guaranteed among the number of republics in Latin America, governments already in default, in which the United States has invested nearly $8,000,000,000 in gold, or the equivalent thereof.

In conclusion, I shall quote article 2 of the bylaws, paragraph H:

The voting power of each government on the board of directors shall be distributed as follows: 20 votes for each government for its minimum shares, and 1 vote for each additional share. However, regardless of the amount of stock owned by it, no government shall have a voting power in excess of 50 percent of the total voting power of all the other participating governments on the basis of stock which such other governments own at the time.

This paragraph is self-explanatory, as it states the voting power of each government, irrespective of money invested in the bank, shall be 20 votes, and 1 vote for each additional $100,000 in gold invested in the capital structure of the bank. Do you suppose any citizen of the United States could borrow gold from the United States Treasury on the same terms, as stated in the bylaws of the inter-American bank? Of course not. A citizen of the United States is a criminal if he has gold in his possession, and, gentlemen, it is because of that act you passed in 1934, as you tagged behind your leaders. You are now requested to write the final chapter, and whether you will do it or not remains to be seen, but, if you do, always remember that you have violated your obligation and betrayed the people of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimouus consent to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include quotations from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

NEELY BLOCK-BOOKING BILL

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein an excerpt from the Los Angeles Times with reference to the Neely bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of all the Members of the House to the insertion I am making in the RECORD this morning in connection with the Neely block-booking bill, which shows that 30,000 positions or jobs will be killed in Los Angeles County if this bill passes. May I also call your attention to the fact that already 120,000 indigents are on relief in Los Angeles County; that last year the charity relief bill for Los Angeles County was $43,000,000 and that this year it is $46,000,000; and that this bill has grown from $8,000,000. Fifty-two percent of tax levy now goes for charity relief. The Legislature of California was called into special session about the matter of relief in Los Angeles County. I hope Los Angeles County will not have 30,000 positions killed by the enactment of any such bill as the Neely bill.

Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the following reasons, given by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, why this bill should not be enacted:

[Excerpt from Los Angeles Times of March 1, 1940]

FILM CURB BILL ASSAILED—CHAMBER ASSERTS NEELY MEASURE WOULD PERIL JOBS OF 30,000

Because, among other evils, it would imperil the jobs of 30,000 Los Angeles County motion-picture workers who receive $133,000,000 in wages annually, the Neely block-booking bill yesterday was unqualifiedly condemned on seven counts by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce board of directors.

A community of 125,000 persons here is supported by the industry, which effects a distribution of $172,000,000 annually through the county's business channels in wages, salaries, and payment of materials. Perhaps 15,000 other persons have jobs in subsidiary industries.

SEVEN CONTENTIONS

Seven points on which the bill was condemned include:

1. If any monopolistic abuses exist today in the motion-picture industry, they can be corrected under existing antimonopoly statutes.

2. By specifying the manner in which the business of distributing motion pictures must be conducted, the bill would bring the motion-picture industry under an unworkable form of Government regulation.

3. Established practices in distribution of films which have been developed over a long period of years, as particularly suited to the least expensive distribution of films to the public, would be disrupted by this bill.

4. The bill constitutes a form of Government price regulation costly to the public.

VAGUE AND UNCERTAIN

5. The bill makes the doing of certain acts a crime, and yet those acts are defined in such vague and uncertain terms that no motion-picture producer could safely conduct his business unless he discontinued entirely the age-long practice of giving quantity discounts by quoting a better price to a distributor who contracted to take all of his films than he could quote to a distributor who took only a single film.

6. The bill seeks to establish a form of Government censorship over an industry which has earned a well-deserved reputation for self-imposed regulation.

7. Requirement that a synopsis of each film play and a statement as to treatment of certain types of scenes be made in advance is impracticable and unworkable in the motion-picture business, because many pictures develop and change as their production progresses.

CHAMBER'S STAND

"Many proponents of this bill have been made to think it will improve the moral character of films. Let me say we are unalterably opposed to indecent pictures," President J. L. Van Norman, of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, said in announcing the chamber's stand yesterday. "Welfare of the youth of our country comes first. But we feel certain that this bill can make no contribution to moral uplift in pictures. As a matter of fact, little, if anything, has ever been accomplished by attempting to legislate morality.

"Under the present method of motion-picture distribution with block booking the exhibitor is able to buy all pictures at a price permitting him to market pictures which Americans of every income level can afford to attend.

"Exhibitors are permitted contracts giving them cancelation privileges ranging up to 20 percent," he continued. "Showing the leeway this allows exhibitors in choosing pictures, one picture had more than 12,000 bookings while another in the same block had under 4,000.

"The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce believes that when the Government attempts to regulate matters by law in the field of censorship it enters a field where legislation has no place."

INJUSTICE OF THE C. I. O.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to an advertisement appearing in the Washington Post this morning:

PRESS CAFETERIA—WHY WE ARE BEING PICKETED

Our contract with the C. I. O. expired March 18. Under that contract we earned 3.3 cents net on each dollar of sales. Despite this small return we agreed to renew under same terms. This the C. I. O. rejected, demanding a closed shop and that we discharge 34 employees, or require that they join the union. We refused.

The union further demanded that no employee could be dismissed for any reason whatever without first securing consent of the union. This we refused in light of past experience under our old C. I. O. contract, viz, we had discharged a colored employee upon separate complaints of two white waitresses charging improper advances and misconduct in one case and attempted assault in the other.

The union filed a suit in its own name and in name of the discharged employee demanding $500 damages for the dismissal. During trial of the suit the C. I. O. attorney admitted that "there was a good deal of merit in the reason for the employee's discharge." At conclusion of the trial the union sought to dismiss its own suit, which was refused by the court, and then sought to reduce its claim for damages from $500 to 1 cent. This the court also refused, rendering judgment for the cafeteria. Verification may be had by reference to M. C. Case 383496.

Because of our refusal to agree to a closed shop and our insistence that management be retained by us we are being picketed.

We apologize to our patrons and to the tenants in the National Press Building for any inconvenience they may suffer as a result of the pickets.

PRESS CAFETERIA, INC.,
HARVEY L. COBB, Attorney,
Fourteenth and F Streets.

In the name of justice to our courts, in the name of justice to business, will this Congress permit injustices of this kind to continue? Where is American liberty and American freedom and American justice? Where is the Department of Labor, that they do not act in educating the C. I. O. that court orders must be the law of this land?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein an article by the Farm Bureau, showing how one group of farmers solve the farm problem.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to some remarks made by the distinguished Congresswoman from Massachusetts in a recent issue of the RECORD, and further to draw your attention to the fact that there is a great deal of truth in what she had to say about the Bata Shoe Corporation.

Coming as I do from the triple cities of Binghamton, Johnson City, and Endicott, in Broome County, up-State New York, it is my privilege and honor to represent some 20,000 Endicott-Johnson shoe workers, and to attempt to reflect their desires in this Chamber, and I may say that in the Endicott-Johnson locality the workers own their homes, have felt very little the causes of depression, and have maintained a standard of living throughout that is comparable with any section of America.

A glance at Representative ROGERS' speech reveals that the Bata Co., since coming into the United States and opening plants at Belkamp, Md., has taken steps to pretty thoroughly control even the private lives of its employees. I, for one, do not like regimentation and mass dictation. Yet here is a case which seems to smack of these odious relationships. It would seem as though the Bata Co. has plans not only to inject its economical and political thought into the present generation of its workers, but also into the workers of tomorrow. Such methods I denounce as un-American and not conducive to the best interests of our Nation.

I mentioned the fact that I was the representative of that typically American working body, the Endicott-Johnson workers. In the valley of fair play, as we call the place where the Susquehanna and Chenango Rivers meet, the buzz and the din of a hundred shoe factories can be heard as the daily testimonial of the satisfaction which 20,000 industrious men and women voice. For the past five decades they have represented the most perfect relationship between employee and employer which America has ever known. They call their community the Home of the Square Deal. They have never had need for protection against the scions of industry, because their scions worked side by side with them, and have given them every opportunity to participate in the progress and the profits of the institution for which they worked. They have been and are considered partners, and are taught that to work for the corporation's interests is to work for their own. Words of mine do not need to prove that the Endicott-Johnson workers are satisfied with their lot. I need only to point out that just a few weeks ago they upheld by an overwhelming vote of 6 to 1 in an election held by the National Labor Relations Board their time-honored principle of an open shop.

In these troublous times, when it is so easy on the part of agitators to stir up trouble between employer and employees, and when every section of the country has yielded to this influence, it is certainly proof that this vast industrial democracy, as it is called, is contented. It is my suggestion that the officials of the Bata Co. take heed of the splendid results of the fair and decent treatment which have been accorded to the people in Endicott-Johnson. It is further my suggestion that as long as they are in this country the Bata plants will try to follow these principles of worker relationships. It is my hope that they will go into the valley of fair play and note the loyalty, the respect, and the genuine enthusiasm which Endicott-Johnson employees have for their system. And last, it is my earnest advice and counsel that Bata Shoe Co. make drastic changes in their present relationship with their personnel so that they may emulate and perpetuate a great and truly American institution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement made by Mr. Earl McClintock, of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

THE AMERICAN FDERATION OF LABOR IS ONE OF OUR NATION'S GREATEST INSTITUTIONS

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein one or two short letters, and to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker. It is a democracy and in action it has no power of compulsion. Organized labor is the keystone of democracy around which freedom and liberty revolve. It is a rope of human hands, linked together by the will for cooperation. It is a federation of unions, just as the United States is a federation of States. It is closely patterned after the United States Government. The American Federation of Labor itself stands for the Federal Government. The national unions represent the States. The central labor unions represent the local governments. Each is independent in its own field. Its laws become effective solely through the consent of the governed, whose representatives make the laws. It is a representative organization and through these representatives the weakest member in the smallest union can make himself heard and present his views. This voluntarism and democratic set-up is the reason why this great federation has existed throughout the years and has constantly gained in strength, power, and influence. Its effective aims are justice, liberty, and security for all.

LABOR ORGANIZES

Beginning with Peter Maguire, of the Carpenters and Joiners Union of New York City, and coming on down through the years it has developed great and courageous leaders who have carried the banner of labor for the welfare of the masses to the pinnacle of success. Late in the summer of 1881 at Terre Haute, Ind., a group of union leaders developed the national-union idea. They drafted organization plans and called a trades-union conference at Pittsburgh on November 10, 1881. The Pittsburgh conference was attended by union chiefs from all over the country. Outstanding among these leaders was Samuel Gompers, of the Cigar Makers Union of New York.

The Pittsburgh conference created a Federation of Trades and Labor Unions of the United States and Canada, adopted a program of 13 points, elected a legislative committee, but failed to provide revenues for headquarters, salaries, and so forth.

GOMPERS MADE PRESIDENT

During the next 5 years a great threat came to the organization in the form of the Knights of Labor; however, the trade-unions rallied and overcame this opposition, and in December 1886, at Columbus, Ohio, elected Samuel Gompers president, with a salary of $1,000 per year. Mr. Gompers' first office was a single room donated by the cigarmakers' local in New York City. In it he had a second-hand kitchen table for his desk and a wooden box for his chair.

Filled with zeal for service and determination to liberate the laborers of our Nation, he continued his services as head of the organization, with the exception of 1 year—1894—until 1924. Then, on account of declining health, he was forced to retire. His final message in 1924 was read to the national convention by the Honorable William Green, secretary, United Mine Workers. An excerpt from this message is as follows:

Guided by voluntary principles, our federation had grown from a weakling into the strongest, best-organized labor movement of all the world.

Mr. Gompers was not only a brilliant and able labor executive but was of tremendous help to the Federal Government—particularly during the World War period. During this time he frequently conferred with President Wilson on war measures and probably contributed as much to the success of the American forces during this war as any individual in this country.

He was succeeded as president of the American Federation of Labor by the incumbent, Hon. William Green. President Green has proven to be the man of the hour during the great trials facing the American Federation of Labor in the past few years. Under his administration labor has gained prestige, power, and influence in national and international affairs. Not only have the rights of the workers been protected by Federal laws, but labor is regarded as a great stabilizing influence for Americanism and democracy. The right for labor to bargain collectively by representatives of their own choosing, better working conditions for laborers, shorter hours, and many other goals have been obtained.

BILL GREEN ENDORSES LEX GREEN

I have voted for these measures beneficial to labor—the right to bargain collectively, the train-length-limit bill, the Railroad (Pension) Retirement Acts, wage and hour law, unemployment insurance, employers' liability law, and many others. I consider it an honor to be endorsed by President Green, as follows:

JANUARY 24, 1940.

Mr. CHARLES E. SILVA,
President, Florida State Federation of Labor,
Tampa, Fla.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Congressman R. A. (LEX) GREEN has represented the Florida Second Congressional District continuously for the last 15 years. During that period of time he has constantly kept in touch with the officers and representatives of the American Federation of Labor at our headquarters and has invariably supported legislation which we were advocating.

He has proven himself by his conduct and votes to be a true friend of the American Federation of Labor.

I wish you would bring this letter to the attention of our members in Mr. GREEN's district, with the request that they and their friends vote for him.

Fraternally yours,

WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

The American Federation of Labor is making today great contributions to the stability of the American Government in such timely things as combating un-American and subversive activities of un-American groups by holding up the American bar against the entrance of undesirable aliens, law enforcement, and other things conducive to better American citizenship.

WAGES RISE, HOURS SHORTER

In 1881 the average American worker was paid a wage of $10.71 for a workweek of 63 hours. Today the average is about $24 for a 37½-hour week. This includes the unorganized workers. The average for the organized workers today is more than $40 per week for a 37½-hour week.

It was my fortune a few weeks ago to ride side by side with a locomotive engineer on his run between Jacksonville, Fla., and Savannah, Ga. He was operating one of the new large Diesel-powered motors pulling the Silver Meteor for the Seaboard Railway Co. He was a personal friend of mine, and we could not help but contrast this powerful, efficient, and comfortable device with the locomotive of about 40 years ago. He told me of his long hours per day when he entered the service, the firing of the old-style locomotive engine, the fabulous number of cords of wood he handled every 24 hours, and the small pay received. If I recall correctly, he averaged from 12 to 18 hours in a day's work and received from 90 cents to $1 per day—not per hour—for his salary. His present employment on this modern locomotive is comfortable; his hours of employment are short; there is less danger of accidental death; he receives reasonable wages per hour and per month and is protected by the railroad retirement pension benefits in his old age.

This wholesome change of conditions has been brought about largely through the influence and strength of organized labor, and it has given me pleasure during the 15 years I have represented the Second Congressional District to vote for measures for the assistance, protection, and benefit of labor.

RAILROAD BROTHERHOODS ENDORSE GREEN

Labor has repeatedly endorsed me for reelection as a Member of Congress, and I have just been advised that the national labor legislative representatives of the railway brotherhoods have again endorsed me for reelection and commended my record to the voters of my district. I have abiding faith in my friends of labor and know that they will vote for me now as they have in the past. I have kept the faith. I have done practically all kinds of hard labor, even to firing boilers with coal and wood and using a sledge hammer in a blacksmith's shop. I know the needs of the laboring man and appreciate the golden virtues of labor.

This is an inspiration to me because I believe firmly in the dignity of labor and the majesty of toil. I honor the man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow. The laboring man is the Gibraltar and strength of American civilization and institutions. I shall continue to vote the vote of labor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief resolution adopted by the Idaho Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows, on the life of the late Senator William E. Borah.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a timely article from one of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8202) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri, if this conference is agreed to, whether we are going to get an opportunity to vote with respect to the difference between what the bill was when it left the House and what it is now, after coming back to us from the Senate, so that the House may express itself on the legislation. House reductions against Senate increases. Why the Senate resolution for economy? Where is the economy movement they wanted to initiate? With income taxes increased March 15 about 30 percent above last year, and with a deficit for this year, March 20 from July 1, 1939, of $2,676,787,238.30, would it look to anyone that has any sense of obligation of our Government that we can keep this up? I think it is a terrible way to run our Government—a lack of business sense and ability. Will the Congress be able to run the Government, or will they leave the debt for their children? It is dishonest and unjust the way this Congress is running the affairs of our Government.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The committee of conference expects to bring back to the House all amendments on which the rules require the House to vote.

Mr. RICH. Are we going to have an opportunity to vote on these large increases, to see whether the House is for economy, because we know now that the Senate, from what they are doing with the bills they send back here, are increasing all of them, and they are not for economy, as their actions would indicate? We want to find out whether the Senate meant what they said in the beginning of this session when they said they were for economy. It does not look to me as if they were. We want to find out whether the House is in favor of economy in the operation of Government. Will we have an opportunity to vote on these large increases?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The House has already shown very conclusively its attitude on these various economies by voting for them, and by sending them over to the Senate, and the conferees expect to sustain the position of the House. Just what will be brought back we are unable to say until we have consulted with the Senate managers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. CANNON of Missouri, Mr. TARVER, and Mr. LAMBERTSON.

REPRESENTATIVE ROBERT L. DOUGHTON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FORESTRY

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

House Concurrent Resolution 51

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for making the report of the Joint Committee on Forestry (established pursuant to S. Con. Res. 31, 75th Cong.) is hereby extended to April 1, 1941, and any amounts available for the expenses of such committee shall be available for expenditure until such date.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, also reported the following resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

House Resolution 436

Resolved, That notwithstanding the provisions of clause 2, rule XXI, it shall be in order to consider, without the intervention of any point of order, in connection with the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, the appropriation and language providing for the National Youth Administration for such fiscal year.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. This is District day, and the Chair recognizes the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REGULATING DISPOSAL OF CERTAIN REFUSE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H. R. 8262) to regulate, in the District of Columbia, the disposal of certain refuse, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the acts of Congress entitled "An act to regulate, in the District of Columbia, the disposal of certain refuse, and for other purposes," approved January 25, 1898, and "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate, in the District of Columbia, the disposal of certain refuse, and for other purposes,' approved January 25, 1898," approved March 20, 1902, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to maintain, upon any original lot or any subdivisional lot, situated on any street in the District of Columbia, where there is a public sewer and water main available for the use of such lot, any system of disposal of human excreta except by means of water closets connected with such sewer and water main.

SEC. 3. That no person shall, in the District of Columbia, erect or maintain a privy, or other means or system for the disposal of human excreta, except by means of water closets connected with a sewer and water main, without having secured from the health officer a permit so to do.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered to make and enforce any such regulations as they deem necessary to regulate the design, construction, and maintenance of any system of disposal of human excreta, and the handling, storage, treatment, and disposal of human body wastes.

SEC. 5. That any person who shall violate or aid or abet in violating any of the provisions of this act or of the regulations promulgated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $50 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 15 days.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to repeal those measures which are now obsolete relative to the disposal of certain refuse. Changes in the mode of living in the District of Columbia, the increase in the population, and scientific knowledge have caused radical improvement in the design and maintenance of sanitary privies. This proposal gives the Commissioners authority to make health regulations and to bring these health regulations in line with modern practices. The bill comes to the House with the unanimous report of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the approval of the District Commissioners. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION OF WAITING ROOM AT COMMODORE BARNEY CIRCLE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H. R. 8917) to authorize the construction of a waiting room and comfort station in Commodore Barney Circle, United States Reservation 55–56, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, for the convenience of the public, to permit the Capital Transit Co., of Washington, D. C., to construct, maintain, and operate, at its own expense, a waiting room and comfort station in Commodore Barney Circle, United States Reservation 55–56: Provided, That the plans and specifications for this structure shall first be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, and the Commission of Fine Arts: Provided further, That the Capital Transit Co. is hereby authorized to operate within such structure, either directly or by contract, such concession as in the determination of the Secretary of the Interior or his duly authorized representative may be desirable for the convenience of the public, and apply the revenues derived therefrom toward the cost of maintenance and operation of the structure. In the event the Capital Transit Co. shall at any time discontinue the operation of the waiting room and comfort station as herein provided, the same shall become the property of the United States.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the construction of a streetcar and bus terminal facility at the westerly end of the new John Philip Sousa Bridge across the Anacostia River.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. My understanding is that the streetcar company is quite willing to construct this shelter at its own expense, and that it will involve no expenditure by the District of Columbia or the Federal Government, but that permission is necessary in order to have this construction made. Is that correct?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say to the gentleman that his observation is correct. We know there has been rapid development in this area along Pennsylvania Avenue east of the Anacostia River, and it seems necessary that such facilities be provided, as it will be a great convenience to the thousands of people who have built homes there recently and who have established businesses in that locality.

I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MEMORIAL FOUNTAIN TO MEMBERS OF METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8792) to authorize and direct the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to accept and maintain a memorial fountain to the members of the Metropolitan Police Department, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to accept and maintain for the District of Columbia the gift of a memorial fountain to the members of the Metropolitan Police Department: Provided, That the design and model of the memorial fountain are approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, and thereafter erected at a location to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the National Capital Park and Planning Commission on land now owned by the District of Columbia, for the municipal center.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide for the acceptance and maintenance of a memorial fountain to the members of the Metropolitan Police Department. A movement was started several years ago about the time of the World War for the erection of such a fountain and the funds are now available. It is to be dedicated to the memory of policemen who died or who may die in the future in line of duty. No appropriation is necessary as the funds have been gathered and I am advised that the cost of maintenance will be negligible.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. In a general way, what will that expense be? A slight expense sometimes runs into large figures, and we ought to know definitely about what this is going to be.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think I am safe in saying from the discussion in the committee, that it would not run over $150 a year. That would be the top amount.

Mr. RICH. Then the gentleman feels, if we permit this to be erected, $150 a year will be the amount necessary for the maintenance of that fountain?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That will be the top figure. I do want to reiterate there will be no cost in the construction—simply a small cost for the maintenance.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TAX LEGISLATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, standing committees of this body are charged with very definite responsibilities, and in that list is the District of Columbia Committee. I am sure that I need not express the feeling that the Members of the House on the District of Columbia Committee naturally have about service on this group. It is not an easy task. Neither is the task of membership on any committee. But there are very peculiar circumstances connected with service on the Committee on the District of Columbia which at times seem to aggravate Members a bit in connection with the discharge of their duties.

There may be an attempt this afternoon, and perhaps a proper attempt, to halt the consideration of a bill which will be brought here in a few minutes, to provide revenue for the District of Columbia. Certainly no Member of this House would say that a tax bill could be brought to this floor which would have the favorable attitude of every Member present.

I simply take the floor at this time to express the hope that the Members of the House of Representatives will give the Committee on the District of Columbia the opportunity to have considered this afternoon a measure to provide revenue for the District of Columbia.

I want it clearly understood that this is District of Columbia day and that in bringing this measure here this afternoon the Committee on the District of Columbia has acted in no manner contrary to the proper and expeditious consideration of bills before it. The present measure was reported out of the full Committee on the District of Columbia. There was a difference of opinion. The fight, shall I say, was very keen within the committee as to the provisions of the bill.

We are bringing in a combination income and sales tax measure for your consideration. I do want to refute most energetically, however, the implication which seems to be drawn by certain individuals that the consideration of this bill today violates some agreement which some individual may have made in connection with its consideration.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. From the press it is indicated that some of our friends on the minority seem to think that there should be some delay on this because of the absence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], two able members of this committee. I ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that both of these gentlemen were consulted? Both gentlemen knew the legislation was coming up, and neither one of them made any vigorous protest to its coming up at this time.

Mr. RANDOLPH. In reply to the gentleman from Oklahoma, I will say that I was attempting to bring my remarks to that question and to say that at no time did the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee or the committee itself agree with any individual that consideration of the tax bill would not come on District day, which falls on this Monday. I want to make this very clear. The distinguished majority leader of the House telephoned to me and in my absence talked with the clerk of the committee. This was prior to Wednesday's meeting, when the bill was considered in executive session. He stated at that time that there was a possibility an appropriation bill might be called for Monday consideration and asked, if so, whether the District Committee would postpone consideration of legislation, not tax legislation but simply any legislation that might be coming up Monday. I attempted to contact the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] but he had left the city. I did not talk to Speaker BANKHEAD on this subject nor to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. District day was set by those in charge not by any strenuous request upon the part of the chairman or other members of the committee but just in the natural order of business. This is the reason that District day, which falls on this Monday, has on its calendar for consideration this bill, among others, which have been brought before this body.

In the Committee on the District of Columbia since I have been its chairman—and I presume such procedure has been followed in the past—there has never been an attempt by the majority to impress itself upon the minority from a political standpoint. I have leaned over backward to take all members of the committee into my confidence and to discuss procedure connected with the consideration of legislation, believing then, as I believe now, that the Members of this House in considering District legislation look upon it perhaps in a little different manner than they do certain other legislative proposals which come before them.

I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The statement has been made that the minority members, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], have been consulted concerning the bringing up of this bill. May I ask the gentleman when this bill was acted upon by the full committee?

Mr. RANDOLPH. On last Wednesday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] has been investigating the locks at Panama Canal on an official visitation for over a week. When could the gentleman from Massachusetts have been consulted on it? When was he consulted on it?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLS. I may say to my friend from Massachusetts that on Monday preceding last Wednesday this bill was considered in the committee and by reason of the fact that the bill had not yet been printed—and the gentleman, of course, will understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] was a member of the subcommittee—by reason of the fact that the bill had not yet been printed we could not take it up for consideration on Monday. But by agreement in the committee on Monday it was agreed without a dissenting vote that the bill should be considered at the special meeting on Wednesday at which time the bill would be reported and ready for hearing on the floor today.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] was present at that meeting.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. But he did not have the slightest idea when he left Washington that the bill was coming up today.

Mr. NICHOLS. He knew positively, I may say to my friend from Massachusetts, that the bill was coming up today.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There is something wrong about it here, because when I talked with the majority leader about a week ago he himself did not know this bill was coming up today.

Mr. NICHOLS. The majority leader might not have, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] are able members of this subcommittee who have worked hard on this legislation. They know what is going on in their committee. They knew that the bill would be reported out on Wednesday and in the regular course of affairs go to the calendar for consideration today; and there was even discussion by these gentlemen as to whether they would file a minority report. I do not know whether they filed one or not.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] ask to have the bill postponed because he would be unable to be present in the House today?

Mr. NICHOLS. No, he did not. He indicated to me that he would be out of the city and, of course, was in hopes that we would not take it up. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] was very serious.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I resent the reflection upon the gentleman from Illinois, that he was not serious.

Mr. NICHOLS. I mean no reflection on the gentleman from Illinois at all.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the distinguished minority leader for a moment. I want no misunderstanding relative to my position in this matter. I have the highest regard for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES]. They are two very able members of the committee. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] were here today I am sure he would say that I have cooperated fully with him in the consideration of District of Columbia measures. I talked with him on the House floor Thursday afternoon before he left the city to go to his congressional district and I suggested to him that, since he would be absent on today, it perhaps would be best if I asked the consent of the House to have until midnight Thursday to file a minority report in connection with this bill. He said he believed such a request need not be made. I spoke to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE] in the same vein. He also said he believed he would not desire to file a minority report.

What the Members do so far as this bill is concerned will certainly be the responsibility of the House. I would like to have the measure considered this afternoon strictly on its merits. I may say that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MCGEHEE], a member of the Subcommittee on Fiscal Affairs is in favor of this bill, yet he is out of the city in Mississippi. So we find there are Members on both sides of the question who are out of the city. But we sit here as a body today to consider the bill for raising revenue for the District of Columbia. I should like to see it given an opportunity to be explained and debated on this floor. I will abide by whatever the House does, and I am sure the committee will. We are simply attempting to bring here for proper consideration a measure which should be given right-of-way at this time. A revenue bill must be passed. I am not in favor of all of the provisions of the proposed revenue-raising measure. At the proper time, if the Members allow the bill to be debated, I shall offer an amendment which would exempt all purchases under 10 cents from application of the sales tax. There are, no doubt, other amendments which might be offered which I would support.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, we members of the District of Columbia Committee have the highest regard and respect for our chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia, the Honorable JENNINGS RANDOLPH, who, at the request of the majority members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is bringing in here this afternoon, for consideration by this House, a bill that includes both a gross-income tax and a sales tax. This sales tax attempts to get down so low as to tax those who buy a 5-cent article. As for myself, I have always opposed a sales tax and shall continue to do so as long as there is any strength in my body to do so, because it attempts to tax those who can least afford to pay. Now, I know nothing about the situation of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], but I do know that when this bill was considered by the District of Columbia Committee, very few of us were under the impression that it was coming up on the floor today. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] did not know it was coming up today, and, in fact, he told me on the floor of the House that had he known of it early enough he would have canceled his reservation. He stated that he wanted to be here when this bill is being considered, because he is unalterably opposed, like myself, to a sales tax in any form because of the unfairness of such a tax. The question before us this afternoon is, Are we going to place a burden upon those on relief, or the widows, or the very poor people here, by making them pay a tax that should be paid by people who can well afford to pay a higher tax? Why not place a higher tax on whisky; why not on beer? The tax on alcohol is lower here than in any other State in the United States, and I believe we are all agreed that all who drink beer and whisky are doing it because it is a luxury and not a necessity, and certainly an increase in tax there is not going to hurt anyone. That is the reason I would like to see consideration of the bill withheld until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] return to the city. As a member of the District of Columbia Committee, I did not know that this would be brought up today until I read of it in the newspaper.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In view of the fact this is a 73-page sales-tax bill, which was introduced on March 19 and reported on March 21, would it not be a good idea to lay this bill aside and use the balance of the day to consider the Schulte anti-milk-monopoly bill?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes; I think that is a good suggestion, and I hope that in the very near future this House may have an opportunity to vote on the Schulte milk bill, and if this bill passes it will give to the poor people in the District of Columbia milk at a price they can afford to pay.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Is the gentleman in favor of some kind of a tax bill so that the District Government may secure funds with which to operate?

Mr. SCHULTE. I am very much in sympathy with a tax bill, I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I am not in sympathy with making a woman who must scrub floors for a living for herself and family, or a widow who has received a small life-insurance policy or receiving a small pension, or a man on the W. P. A., or a man on relief pay the tax bill that rightfully should be paid by those who are riding around in big cars chauffeur-driven and with thousands of dollars in the bank and large real-estate holdings. Certainly those are the men who should rightfully pay the tax and instead of that they are now trying to shift the burden on the working man who certainly cannot afford to pay a sales tax on the wage he is getting. This bill is opposed by every working man and women in the District of Columbia, including the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman spoke about the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia bringing in this bill. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia does bring in the bill, but it is a bill that comes from the committee. I explained that this bill was reported out by the committee. I do not want the implication left that I am attempting to bring in the bill. It is the Committee on the District of Columbia that brings in the bill.

Mr. SCHULTE. No one denies that, and I am sorry if the gentleman understood me that way, as the chairman is only doing what he is instructed to do by the majority of the committee. There was a sharp division of opinion in the committee. There are two schools of thought, one which advocates putting the tax where it rightfully belongs; that is, on real estate and intangible property. Then we have the other group, who want to place a sales tax on the working people to relieve the big fellow from his just due.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. Does not my friend know that any time a bill is reported by the full committee of the Committee on the District of Columbia it goes to the calendar and it is up for consideration on the following District Day? This is District Day.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman is absolutely right, but we were given to understand it was not to be brought up at this particular time, and I do hope the membership of this House will stand by me and help to kill this sales-tax bill that would place a burden on those who could least afford to pay.

REVENUE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8980) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-seven Members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seven Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

REVENUE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8980) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and pending that motion, I should like to propound two unanimous-consent requests. First, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an expert who has aided this committee in the preparation of this bill be permitted to sit at the committee table.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid this would be establishing quite a precedent. It is contrary to the rules of the House.

Mr. NICHOLS. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that when similar bills were considered on two previous occasions on the floor of the House the same request was made and agreed to. Certainly there is precedent for such action in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair observes that under the rules the Chair cannot entertain such a request.

Mr. NICHOLS. Similar requests have been submitted and granted when previous tax bills have been under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Rule XXXIII, which enumerates those persons entitled to the floor, provides, in part, as follows:

It shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain a request for the suspension of this rule or to present from the Chair the request of any Member for unanimous consent.

This is the general rule relating to admission to the floor of the House.

Of course, personally, the Chair has no feeling in the matter. Although it may have been done heretofore, the attention of the Chair was not called to it.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to see if we can agree on time for debate. Is 30 minutes on a side agreeable to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I believe there should be at least an hour of debate on a side. It is a pretty important subject we are being asked to consider now.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to an hour and a half, 45 minutes to be controlled by myself and 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is a 73-page bill, and it was introduced on March 19 and reported on March 21. It deals with a sales tax on the great rank and file of the people. I object to a limitation such as is now proposed.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 2 hours, 1 hour to be controlled by myself and 1 hour by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I believe we ought to have 4 or 5 hours of general debate on a subject like this, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8980.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHULTE) there were—ayes 70, noes 79.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just counted the Members present in the House. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 197, answered "present" 1, not voting 125, as follows:

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the District of Columbia feels that now it has discharged its duty to the great number of Members of the House of Representatives who came to the committee and asked that the committee bring out legislation which would not compel people employed in the District of Columbia and working for the United States Government, who come from States that have an income tax, to pay three income taxes. Of course, the bill, as it is now on the books, which was written in conference, not considered by this body or the Senate, except in a conference report, was an ill-advised bill, is bad law, and everyone agrees to that. So you leave yourselves now with only an income tax, no exemptions in the low brackets, taxing the low-income groups, Government employees with very little exemption, and it compels them to pay, if they pay an income tax in their State, also to pay one in the District of Columbia, as well as to the Federal Government; but I presume that is the sense of the House and I have no quarrel with you gentlemen.

I am convinced that had you permitted an explanation of this bill, that probably 50 percent of you who voted just now to refuse to let us even consider the bill would have, in the end, voted for the bill. It has been dubbed a sales-tax bill. Well, that is not exactly correct. This was a combination of sales and income tax which to have worked must have been applied both together, and let me point this out to the Members: When I went on this committee just a few years ago and when the present membership of the committee started considering this legislation for the District of Columbia, there was a bill on the books which provided that the Federal Government should pay 40 percent of the cost of the District government. At the moment there is a $44,000,000 budget to run the District of Columbia. We took that provision of law off of the books and we on this committee think that the people who live in the District of Columbia not only should be permitted to pay the tax to support their own government and remove the burden from the backs of your constituents, but that it is their duty so to do. So we brought in this legislation, and let me point out a further thing: There is no jurisdiction in the United States which can give precedent for tax matters in the District of Columbia. There is no other taxing jurisdiction like it in the United States. Why, one of the great oppositions to this bill came from the suburban areas of Washington—people earning every cent of their income in the District of Columbia, living in Maryland or living in Virginia, who did not want any form of a sales tax, of course, because as it is they use the police force, the fire department, the streets, the parks, and even the schools of the District of Columbia, and live in other jurisdictions and pay not one cent to the support of the District government, and, of course——

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. No; I do not yield.

And, of course, if they have to pay a little sales tax they would have to contribute something to the support of the Government which they use, and let me tell you something about that sales-tax provision. I know that many of you gentlemen voted against it because you are interested in the people in the low-income groups and do not want them to be imposed on or burdened unduly by the payment of taxes. We realized that and so, in this bill, we provided for exemptions on food, exemptions on medicines, and exemptions on rents. Sixty percent, approximately, of an income in brackets below $6,000 goes for these three items. Under this bill with the exemptions, according to statistics from the Department of Labor, a person with an income of $2,000 a year would have paid in sales taxes 0.55 of 1 percent of their income. Still, it would have raised a sufficient amount of money to run the government of the District. Now, here is the position in which you leave the District of Columbia and the position in which you leave your constituents. Last year we repealed two taxes, the business-privilege tax and the intangible personal-property tax. This took off of the books $5,000,000 worth of income of the District of Columbia. Of course, I had nothing to do with that, because I was against it all the time. However, the present personal income-tax law was written in its place, which is going to yield, under the most generous estimate, only about $850,000, while the corporate tax will yield only $2,000,000. So you started immediately last year with a deficit of over $2,000,000 in the District of Columbia. You have not now provided any further revenue, so you will have at least another $2,000,000 deficit. The Federal Government gives the District of Columbia $6,000,000 annually. Where will the District make up this deficit? Do you know? Why, certainly, from the Federal Government, and your constituents will pay the bill.

[Here the gavel fell].

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some letters which I have received in support of an increase in the appropriation of the National Youth Administration provision in the Labor-Federal Security appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this permission to insert in the RECORD a telegram I received from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, sent to me under date of March 23, from a city in Ohio, where he was on that date, strongly urging support of an increase in the appropriation for the National Youth Administration, increasing it from $85,000,000 to at least the amount which was appropriated last year. I put this telegram in the RECORD for the information of the Members of the House, in view of the fact that this matter will come up for consideration probably tomorrow or the next day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COSHOCTON, OHIO, March 23, 1940.

Hon. JOHN R. MCCORMACK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The National Youth Administration is making a definite contribution to the problem of unemployment. Through this agency of Government many thousands of the youth of our land are accorded educational opportunities and other thousands are being accorded economic assistance. Any curtailment of the activities or services of the National Youth Administration will tend to aggravate our serious unemployment situation. For this special reason I respectfully urge that Congress appropriate the amount of money asked for by Commissioner Aubrey Williams for the work of the National Youth Administration during the coming year. I earnestly hope and trust you will respond favorably to this recommendation and render all assistance possible.

WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a very splendid editorial from the Randolph Review of Elkins, W. Va., my home city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on the 20th I made some remarks on the floor of the House and obtained permission to extend my remarks. I think I received at that time permission to insert certain tables which I had prepared, but in fear that I am mistaken, I ask unanimous consent to insert those tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LABOR-SECURITY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9007, making appropriations for the Department of Labor, Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to submit a request with reference to the control of the time?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, the control of the time is provided for in the unanimous-consent request granted last Thursday, which also controls the question of whether or not debate shall be confined to the bill. There is no request to be submitted at this time for the conclusion of the general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by the RECORD that the request submitted by the gentleman from Georgia covers the control of the time only on the day on which the bill was called up.

Mr. TARVER. Then, Mr. Speaker, pending the motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate may be controlled equally by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The Committee on Rules this morning granted a rule to make some matters now in the bill which are subject to a point of order immune from the point of order. Those are very controversial matters and the House probably is not familiar with what has been done. Therefore, I ask the gentleman whether it is the intention to close debate today or will the general debate be continued until the Members of the House have an opportunity to discuss the provisions covered by the rule granted today?

Mr. TARVER. There is not only no disposition to close debate upon the part of those who desire to be heard in regard to anything contained in the bill, but it is the desire of the subcommittee that general debate shall proceed until reasonable opportunity has been afforded to all such Members to discuss any provisions of the bill in which they may be interested. Of course, if we reach a point in the general debate today when no additional Members desire to be heard, we would, of course, expect to proceed to the reading of the bill.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Just what is the status of the rule? Will the rule come up tomorrow morning at 12 o'clock?

Mr. TARVER. We hope to bring the rule up before the House for consideration tomorrow upon the convening of the House.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman proceeding upon the assumption that the rule reported making in order the consideration of this provision appropriating for the National Youth Administration will be adopted, and, therefore, debate will be had upon that provision of the bill?

Mr. TARVER. Of course, I assume that the membership of the House, at least a number of them, would want to discuss the National Youth Administration provisions in the bill, and they have that right, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Labor-Federal Security appropriation bill, 1941, with Mr. BUCK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how the time stood at the close of the debate on Thursday?

The CHAIRMAN. At the end of the debate on Thursday the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] had consumed 1 hour and 58 minutes; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL], 2 hours and 21 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to confine my remarks to a discussion of the provisions of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor.

When this wage and hour bill was before the House I think a great many Members will recall that the advocates of that legislation supposed there would be no great administrative expense in connection with the wage and hour set-up; but in 1939 the appropriation for this division totaled $1,250,000. The estimate was $1,450,000. That was in 1939. In 1940 the regular appropriation, including miscellaneous expenses, travel expenses, printing and binding, contingent expenses, and so forth, totaled $3,116,570. The estimate at that time was $3,350,000.

Then, in 1940 also there was a supplementary appropriation—a deficiency appropriation—of $1,200,000, making a total of $4,316,000.

In 1941, for the regular fiscal year of 1941, the estimate is $7,486,400, including salaries, miscellaneous expenses, travel expenses, contingent expenses, printing and binding, and so forth, and the committee has submitted an appropriation of $6,140,000. I am just showing by these figures how this Bureau has grown by leaps and bounds from 1939 to 1941. I do not want it construed that I am against the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor. I signed the petition to bring the bill to the floor, and I voted for the bill, but I do think it should proceed in order and organize accordingly.

I want to take my time to give a discussion of what the Wage and Hour Division is doing, what their function is, and how they are doing it, and why they are curtailed somewhat in their proposed appropriation for 1941.

The Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, because of the scope of its work, heavy responsibilities, and some weaknesses in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, is confronted with a gigantic task, but the hearings before the subcommittee have clarified some points not heretofore known by most of us, and I am glad to have this opportunity to assure the Members of the House that under the able direction of Colonel Fleming, definite progress is being made toward a better understanding of the wage-hour problem between employers, employees, and the personnel of the Bureau.

Industry is anxious for the work of this governmental agency to become standardized so that guesswork as to the application of the law may be reduced to a minimum, with benefit to all concerned. Voluntary compliance with the act is estimated to be about 93 percent, and only 7 percent of the industries are being complained against, which would indicate businessmen in general are willing to comply with the act and interpretative regulations of the Division. A cautious, understanding approach to fair administration by Colonel Fleming and his staff is in evidence, for which they should be commended.

To appreciate the job which the Bureau faces we must consider the great number and varied types of industries in the United States, and I quote a statement as to the number of plants to be inspected:

It was estimated previously, on the basis of tabulations of employers made by the Old Age Insurance Bureau of the Social Security Board, that the Fair Labor Standards Act covered not less than 250,000 of the 350,000 plants in industries generally subject to the act. This estimate included an allowance of less than 30,000 wholesaling establishments covered by the act. The Bureau of Labor Statistics survey on coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act as of April 1939 indicates approximately 70 percent of all wholesaling employees covered by the act. If the number of establishments were proportional to the number of employees, an additional 40,000 plants would have to be covered. Allowing for the likelihood that plants covered by the act will be somewhat larger than plants not covered, the estimate of the number of plants to be inspected regularly must be raised by not less than 20,000. In addition, data compiled by Dun & Bradstreet indicate a net total of nearly 38,000 new establishments in manufacturing and wholesaling in the year 1938 and a net total of a little over 36,000 discontinuances, excluding successions and changes of management from both figures. Assuming the same ratio of coverage as for all other establishments, 28,000 of the outgoing establishments would be classed as covered. Since approximately one-half of the net changes took place in the last 6 months of the year, it may be estimated that routine inspection will include an additional 14,000 plants accounted for by turn-over of business enterprise. It was estimated previously that 25,000 plants would require only a very brief inspection because of high standards already obtaining in these plants with respect to wages and hours. The 80,000 plants remaining in the original grand total of 350,000 would have to be inspected at least once to determine whether or not they are covered by the act. Excluding the latter two categories for the time being leaves a net total of 259,000 establishments to be covered in regular inspections.

The average number of required inspections, as determined by analysis of complaints received, has been 1,182 per month for the period through August 1, 1939. A little over one-third of these were inspections required by an indicated violation of the hours provision, and nearly all of the rest involved the wage provision or both the wage and hour provisions. Estimates of the probable load of inspection work involving violation of the act for the year 1940–41, based on the relative numbers of employees directly affected by the changed wage and hour provisions and by wage orders already recommended prior to the present date, indicate an average of 2,300 inspections required per month for the first 4 months of 1940–41 and 2,500 per month for the remaining 8 months. The estimate for those affected by wage orders is a net figure, including only workers directly affected by the wage order less the number already affected by the general minima. It does not include any estimate of the net number to be directly affected by wage orders expected to take effect during the remainder of the year 1939–40. The estimated total number of inspections required on complaint of violation is therefore something over 30,000 for the year 1940–41.

The Wage and Hour Division plans to train its contemplated staff of inspectors and pay-roll examiners during the first half of the fiscal year 1941 and concentrate on field operations during the last half of the year, but anticipates that at best only about 50 to 60 percent of the work in prospect will be accomplished.

The Division has established 15 regions in the United States and has given the regional directors authority to settle a great many cases without reference to Washington. They may now settle cases up to $50,000 of restitution due employees in any particular case, and they have authority to decide whether cases shall be settled by restitution, whether they shall go to the civil courts for a consent decree, or recommendations shall be made that criminal action be taken. In the case of criminal action, the Department of Justice handles the prosecution.

Statistics show the following relative amounts of restitution paid workers and amounts of restitution which employers have agreed to pay workers as a result of settlement without legal action, because of civil action, and because of criminal action, as of February 21, 1940:

Without legal action, $549,768.40 have been paid and $697,498.64 are to be paid.

Because of civil action, $194,049.99 have been paid and $387,457.13 are to be paid.

Because of criminal action, $32,564.16 have been paid, and $38,608.25 are to be paid.

The amounts I have given you do not include any which may be paid or agreed to as a result of pending negotiations or pending court actions.

The total fines assessed in criminal cases amount to $254,850, but only $122,500 have been paid or will be paid in cash. Payment of the remainder has been suspended by the courts.

I might add some of the courts in these cases have evolved a plan of assessing a fine in a given amount and then collecting approximately 50 percent of that, with the idea and understanding that the employer will then make full restitution to the employee, and the balance will be suspended. It has been thought that this works out better than to put the money into the Federal Treasury by giving it back to the employee.

A statement of litigated cases involving sections 6 and 7 of the act shows: Civil cases, 116 closed, 9 pending, and criminal cases, 35 closed and 28 pending. Those figures are as of February 1, 1940, and do not include 7 pending cases now being prosecuted in the field.

A special inquiry has found that charges that the wage-hour law would bring about widespread factory shut-downs, particularly in the South, have not proved to be true. Neither has the contention that wages would be reduced to the minimum rate by a majority of employers paying wages in excess of the lawful rate been substantiated.

It is evident that some clarifying amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act should be adopted during this session of Congress, and I am hopeful the Committee on Labor will report a bill without undue delay, but it is also apparent that the main objectives of the act should be maintained and that at least the reduced appropriation as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations should be approved so as to enable the Wage and Hour Division to carry out the program of enforcement with which the majority of us are in favor, and which is not intended to work any hardship on legitimate business.

The committee has given laborious consideration to the estimates of the Wage and Hour Division. Exclusive of the items of travel, contingent expenses, and printing and binding, the estimates for 1941 contemplate an expenditure of $6,185,000. If the three items just named are added to the total, it is indicated that the estimates call for an appropriation of $7,486,400, or an increase of $3,169,000, over comparable appropriations for the current fiscal year.

The committee recognizes the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act. They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only lend further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.

The present Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division has been but recently confirmed in his office. I might add that he had nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the estimates for the fiscal year 1941 for the Wage and Hour Division. That was done by his predecessor. The committee are confident that he will satisfactorily work out means and methods of administering this act that will be in conformity with elements of reasonableness and good judgment. The committee know further it is the intention of the present Administrator to build up the enlarged organization in a slow and methodical manner in order that a real selective and efficient personnel may be acquired.

In the light of the facts mentioned, the committee has effected a reduction of $1,035,000 in the proposed increase of $2,611,000 for salaries, which reduction includes the $29,000 adverted to herein under the heading "Office of the Secretary" and has reduced the estimate of $320,000 for miscellaneous expenses to $275,000, or a reduction of $45,000. To summarize, appropriations totaling $5,105,000 for salaries and expenses of the Wage and Hour Division other than "Contingent expenses," "Travel expenses," and "Printing and binding" are contained in the accompanying bill. This sum is $1,643,800 in excess of the appropriations for the current year and is a reduction of $1,080,000 under the 1941 Budget estimates. If the items of "Contingent expenses," "Travel expenses," and "Printing and binding," which are made available to this Division by allotment from general departmental funds, are taken into account, the Wage and Hour Division will have approximately $6,140,000 available for expenditure during the next fiscal year, which does not start or become effective until July 1, 1940; and as both the Secretary of Labor and Colonel Fleming indicated that they proposed certain revision and correction in regulations which would simplify, in their opinion, the work and the Wage and Hour Division, we think they should be given that opportunity during the first 6 months of the fiscal year of 1941. If it is then evident that more funds are necessary to carry out the provisions of the act, Congress will convene in January and a deficiency appropriation and readily be obtained. [Applause.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, at the first session of this Congress I supported an amendment increasing the amount for the National Youth Administration. Today I want to see the amount raised to the same amount as last year.

There are as many youths unemployed in the United States today as there were 1 year ago. They need to be taken care of now just as badly as they did then.

We hear much about pensions for old people and security in old age. To me, old age is a great handicap and we must take care of those who are unfortunate enough to not be able to take care of themselves when they get old, but at the same time youth is just as important. We live under a republican form of government. We believe in democracy, and the only way either can be maintained is through education throughout our whole lives.

Germany is educating youth in nazi-ism, Russia is educating youth in communism, and if we expect to maintain a republic, we must educate our youth in democracy.

I find upon investigation we have 1,500 C. C. C. camps in the United States, of which 44 are in the State of Wisconsin. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, these camps in all the States had a monthly average of 268,441 people in them. The monthly average in all the Wisconsin camps was 5,722 people. The highest number in all the States was 293,441 in January and the lowest 198,004 in March 1939.

It may be of interest to the Members of this House to know of some of the activities of this Youth Administration in Wisconsin, and some of the things they did. I do not want to burden you with too many, so I shall only mention a few. These camps repaired or improved 149 public buildings; built and repaired 24,781 feet of highways, roads, and streets; 38,918 feet of sidewalks, bridle paths, and trails. They did 151,740 lineal feet of landscaping, built 23,826 feet of fence, erected 133,580 feet of snow fences, built 102 playgrounds, planted 251,516 trees in a reforestation program, and renovated and repaired 266,827 books. These are only a few of the 32 activities.

In January and February 1940, 20,654 youths were taken care of in Wisconsin. Of this number, out-of-school work programs accounted for 8,290 in February 1940, and 12,364 in student-work program in January 1940. The number of youths certified and awaiting assignment on January 5, 1940, in Wisconsin was 3,491. The estimated number of needy youth not certified was estimated to be 35,486.

Funds allotted for the fiscal year 1939–40 are $2,343,240. Of this amount there has been allotted for out-of-school work program $1,590,700, and student-work program $757,540. There are 652 schools participating in the student-work program—out of this number there are 82 colleges and universities.

I have letters from students who say that they will have to quit school if they cannot get this help. Now, with so many unemployed, they cannot get a part-time job of any kind.

It may also be interesting to note that during January and February of this year 746,268 youths were taken care of by the N. Y. A.

There were certified and awaiting assignment on January 5, 1940, 340,000, and the estimated number of needy unemployed youth on the same date was 2,119,000.

The turn-over is also important. From July 1, 1939, through January 1940, 154,820 youths left N. Y. A. The average number leaving each month from those unemployed is about 9.1 percent. After adjustments for reassignments, the annual turn-over is over 90 percent.

Of the funds spent during the past fiscal year, 76.8 percent went to youth in the form of wages; 11.6 percent to supervisors; 6.6 percent for materials, supplies, and equipment; and 5 percent for administration.

Take my own district: On March 1, 1940, there were employed in the school-work program 1,016 students, with 68 schools participating, for which an allotment of $36,360 has been made for the fiscal year. A high-school student who could not otherwise attend school may work for and be paid from $3 to $6 per month, the average payment being $4.05.

In the college and graduate-work program, 164 students are employed, with 9 schools participating, for which an allotment of $17,280 has been made for the fiscal year.

These figures do not include students attending colleges or universities located outside of the district. A college student who could not otherwise attend school may work for and be paid from $10 to $20 per month, the average payment being $11.69. In the combined student-work program, including the school-work program and the college- and graduate-work programs, there are 1,180 youths employed in 77 schools and colleges, with a total earning of $53,640.

On the out-of-school work program, there were 981 employed on January 5, 1940, the average monthly earnings being $1,959. For these projects there has been allotted $45,890. On January 5, 1940, there were certified and awaiting assignment 359 youths. Those needy and unemployed were estimated at 2,185, making a total of unassigned, 2,544—more than two and one-half times as many as were assigned. A total of 2,161 youths are employed by the N. Y. A. in my district. A total of $99,530 has been allotted for this employment during the fiscal year. This would be a good investment in youth at any time, but it is especially, now, when 9,000,000 men are out of work and need it badly.

Since 1935, when the National Youth Administration was first organized in Wisconsin, 4,400 youths of my district, have received part-time wages amounting to $220,195.90 for work performed on student-work projects. In addition, 2,329 out-of-town youths have earned a total of $235,457 in wages on work-projects programs. In all, 6,729 young people in my district have benefited by the N. Y. A. wage disbursements, totaling $455,552.90.

Of the counties in my district, the following shows the total number of youths aided and the amount paid out in each county: Number in Brown 1,189, amount paid $89,878.65; number in Door 354, amount $14,771; number in Florence 324, amount $27,953.34; number in Forest 628, amount $38,574.71; number in Kewaunee 183, amount $5,358.59; number in Manitowoc 1,063, amount $83,191.50; number in Marinette 1,082, amount $70,006.28; number in Oconto 721, amount $34,316.56; number in Outagamie 1,185, amount $91,642.36.

Since the inception of the National Youth Administration's student-work and out-of-school work project programs in Wisconsin in September 1935, approximately 55,000 young people in this State have been benefited directly by the part-time work afforded them. Other thousands have benefited indirectly as a result of the accomplishments in community development and the improvements in recreation facilities made by N. Y. A. people.

Thirty-three thousand students who might have had to abandon their educational pursuits because of a shortage of funds have been enabled to continue their studies in Wisconsin colleges, high schools, and vocational schools by means of the wages they earned on part-time jobs. Since 1935 these earnings have amounted to $3,222,467.

Twenty-two thousand other young people, the great majority of whom were members of families on relief, received employment on National Youth Administration out-of-school work projects. During the past 5 years a total of $4,760,061 was disbursed for project work, providing an average monthly wage of approximately $18 to each individual. Many of these young people had been out of work for years. Many of them had never been employed and had found themselves facing that feeling of moral deterioration and frustration that accompanies all unemployment. As a result of the work experience, training, and vocational guidance they received while employed on N. Y. A. projects, hundreds of these young people have now secured jobs in private industry.

In three of the counties in my district—Oconto, Forest, and Florence—the Government has purchased and taken over a large acreage of land from these counties for park and reforestation purposes. In doing this they have left those who did not sell their land to pay the expenses of running the Government in these counties, even, in some instances, to pay off obligations of the counties on bond issues for building good roads, which now benefit the Government, but the remaining taxpayers must carry the burden. No provision has as yet been provided by the Government to lighten this burden on the local taxpayers.

These C. C. C. camps located in these counties, doing the work that local residents should do in reforestation, at least leave the money there, and should not be discontinued until such time as the Government makes some provision to reforest and build parks by local citizens, to be paid for by the Government, or some other provision to take care of local citizens whom the Government deprived of a home and an occupation to help the Government.

No generation of young people has faced a more stubborn barrier to its progress than the present-day problem of insecurity and joblessness. The National Youth Administration is helping to solve that problem by giving them their chance in school, an opportunity for jobs, and the right to work and earn for themselves, and should be continued with sufficient funds to do so. After the billions we have spent on experimentation, we ought to spend some money for something that has proven to be a good investment. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have asked the indulgence of Members for a few minutes for the purpose of saying a few kind words in support of the appropriation for the National Youth Administration and to express the hope that this Congress will place its stamp of approval on that organization and its program for youth.

As you know, the present bill reduces the appropriation for the N. Y. A. $15,000,000 below the sum that is being expended for the N. Y. A. for the present year. If this appropriation is permitted to stand as it is there will be at least 123,000 youth of America who will lose their jobs, and I am quite sure that Members of this House, despite the fact that we may think we are economy-minded, are unwilling to take 123,000 young men and women off the jobs they now have.

N. Y. A. has done a marvelous job all over the country, in every State in the Union. You hear no real criticism of the N. Y. A. or its fine program for youth, but for reasons of economy the committee has felt it necessary to reduce this appropriation $15,000,000 below what is actually being expended this year for the N. Y. A. program.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman does not mean to leave the impression that the committee reduced the estimate $15,000,000, I take it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Oh, no. I did not intend to leave that impression.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman did not mean to say that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. No. If I so stated or left that impression, then I am sorry. You know, one should take an Irishman by what he means, not by what he says.

The point I was endeavoring to make is that the committee has allowed the amount of the Budget estimate of $85,000,000, but that is $15,000,000 below the amount expended by the National Youth Administration during the present year.

In referring to the fact that there has been a reduction under the amount expended in N. Y. A. for the present year I have no desire or intention to criticize the committee. It has done a good job. I appeared before the committee in behalf of the N. Y. A. appropriation and also in support of the appropriation for the C. C. C., which has also been drastically cut. I can fully appreciate what the committee was up against, having recently reported the Interior Department appropriation bill. In the first place, it was faced with a resolution from the full committee that it must bring in the bill below the Budget estimate, which was almost a herculean task. But this Congress cannot afford to take a backward step at this time so far as the National Youth Administration is concerned; and that also applies, of course, to the C. C. C. camps, about which I hope to make some remarks very soon.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the resolution from the Committee on Appropriations was that the subcommittee should bring in their bills under the Budget estimate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman; what I should have said is, that the subcommittees are obliged to bring their bills within the Budget estimate. If I used the word "below," I most humbly beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. Yet I understand this bill is $11,000,000 below the Budget estimate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct, and I commend the committee for reporting the pending bill more than $11,000,000 below the Budget estimate. I wish it had been possible to have cut it even further.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. I think the committee would be glad to have the gentleman use the round figure $12,000,000 below the Budget, since the bill is nearer $12,000,000 below than $11,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman; but, after all, what is $1,000,000 between friends who are economy-minded, especially if the American youth is involved?

The appropriation for the National Youth Administration should be increased this year rather than being drastically cut. Funds for this great worth-while program must not be reduced at the expense of human welfare. Granting the need for economy, I submit that it would be poor economy, poor business judgment, and a very definite backward step to reduce the N. Y. A. appropriation $15,000,000 for the ensuing year.

Since the cry of economy has been raised, let me make it plain that I believe in strict economy in government. Not only do I believe in it but I have practiced it as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. In a previous bill I took the liberty of making a motion that was adopted in the committee to reduce one item $50,000,000. That amendment referred to a straight-out Government subsidy to private shipbuilders. The appropriation for the American merchant marine for the present year was $100,000,000. The Budget estimate for the next fiscal year, to our utter surprise, was $200,000,000. Taking into consideration that this shipbuilding program by the private shipbuilders is more than a year ahead of time, and the fact that the Budget estimate proposed to give as a subsidy for the same shipbuilders $200,000,000 for the present year, I proposed to cut that back to what we had last year, of $100,000,000, which proposal failed of adoption.

With the assistance, however, of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON], we managed first to cut this appropriation $25,000,000 in the subcommittee and in the full committee we reduced it another $50,000,000, making a total cut of $75,000,000 saved to the taxpayers in that one item. Of coure a great wail went up from the poor shipbuilders and their lobbyists have swarmed the Capitol in an effort to restore the entire $75,000,000. The conferees of the House and Senate have finally compromised and we were able to make a saving of $56,000,000 in that one item. That is a sizable saving, but the poor shipbuilders still have their subsidy raised some $44,000,000 above the amount of the appropriation last year. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that inasmuch as Congress is making a clear-cut saving of $56,000,000 below the Budget estimate in one item that we could well afford to take the $56,000,000 thus saved and apply it to the N. Y. A. and the C. C. C. to assist the needy and deserving youth of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Oklahoma is entitled to full credit for his activity and work in securing that particular cut having to do with the merchant marine, but may I say that it also took support from the minority Members along with the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Oklahoma to get this cut in the subcommittee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman. I may say that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] was most helpful in bringing about the cut and I appreciate his suggestion; also his fine spirit of cooperation.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Bringing the figure down so that the man in the street may understand it, may I say that the $56,000,000 saving that has been effected so far as the maritime item is concerned would pay the gentleman's salary as a Member of Congress for the next 600 years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman, and I trust his statement may find its way to my constituents. Let me say to my good friend from Kansas that should I make a wish it would be that the able and active gentleman from Kansas, who believes in getting everything possible for Kansas, be permitted to remain in Congress the rest of his natural life. He is a good investment for Kansas. I mentioned the difficulty in cutting appropriations for the shipping interests only to show that we are economy-minded in reference to certain things but extremely liberal in regard to others. When it comes to the N. Y. A. or the C. C. C., which involves human lives, some of our self-admitted statesmen shrug their shoulders and immediately become economy-minded.

Young people are the most tragic victims of unemployment. The years between 18 and 25 are the time when their whole future is being shaped. This period when they are making the transition from childhood to adulthood is perhaps the most critical period in their lives. It is the time when they should be learning how to work, planning for their life occupation, planning for a home, for a family, and those things that make life meaningful to us.

Today in America there are 4,000,000 or more young people who are denied the chance to get their foot in the door of the adult world. They can make no plans for their careers, for homes and families because they are denied the chance to work. They want jobs, and they need jobs but there are no jobs available for them.

Of course, there are some who argue that young people do not want to work. Some self-admitted economy-minded statesmen contend that young people could get jobs if they wanted them; others have the audacity to say that the trouble with youth is that they are lazy and would not take a job if they could get it.

Those of us who contend that young people are just as ambitious as they ever were, and who say all youth needs is a chance, know that there are about 4,000,000 young men and young women actually looking for jobs. We contend that an increased appropriation for the National Youth Administration will give many of these young people the chance they need, a chance to which they are rightfully entitled.

Those who argue that youth are not willing to work ought to be able to show us 4,000,000 jobs standing vacant, waiting for someone to come along and fill them. It is easy to sit here in comfortable chairs and say youth do not want to work, but the tragedy of it all is there are mighty few jobs. If anyone wants to argue that young people do not want to work, let him show me where there is one vacant job, and I will bring a thousand deserving applicants.

In my office I have letters from hundreds of young people, fine, intelligent Americans—many of them with college education, many of them with considerable experience—all asking for jobs, any kind of jobs. Every Member of this Congress has similar letters from young people who need jobs. But I have yet to hear of the first case of any Congressman getting a letter from an employer saying that he had even one job that he could not fill.

We have all had young people come to our offices here in Washington and back in our districts looking for work, but

I have yet to hear of the first employer coming around asking for help in getting jobs filled.

All we have to do is draw on our own experience to know that this talk that youth do not want to work is plain bunk. Almost any week we can learn of how a hundred or even a thousand people waited in line all night for a chance at 10 jobs. Maybe those people were just staying up on those cold nights because they had insomnia, but it sounds to me like they wanted jobs and wanted them badly.

Right on that point I want to read from a report issued by the American Youth Commission, a non-Government and nonpartisan organization, headed by Owen D. Young, of General Electric—and I quote:

> No good purpose can be served by blaming the young person who has not found a job for himself. The facts of arithmetic cannot be wished away. In the entire country a few thousand jobs probably are vacant because no competent applicant has appeared. Another few thousand chances probably exist for unusual young people to make their own jobs by starting new enterprises. But there are several million more young women who want to work than there are jobs available for them. The totals do not balance. The bright or the lucky get the jobs, but some will have to be left out until their elders who control the economic conditions of the country find some way to open the gates.

That report was signed, not by a radical or an impractical dreamer but by Owen D. Young, who heads one of our large business enterprises. That report was signed by Robert E. Wood, who heads Sears, Roebuck & Co. That report was signed by Henry I. Harriman, past president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. If there were jobs available in industry, if there were openings for young people which were going unfilled, you can bet your last dollar the heads of these big business enterprises would be the first to know about them. If private industry had enough jobs for youth, or if there were any place for our young people to turn, these business leaders would not have come out and recommended a Government youth program to cost over a billion and a half dollars a year; but that is precisely what they did.

At the present time there are about 300,000 out-of-school youth working on projects of the National Youth Administration—working and earning every dime they are paid. There are more than 300,000 additional young people certified as in need and eligible for N. Y. A. employment who are anxious to go to work but who cannot be employed because the National Youth Administration does not have the money. This is the time to expand this program. Any reduction below the present N. Y. A. appropriation of $100,000,000 would be not only false economy but in my judgment would be taking blood money.

The young people employed on N. Y. A. work projects earn around $16 a month, on the average. They come from our most desperately needy families and every dollar, every dime counts with them. If there were any jobs in private industry available they would go out and get them for the sake of the extra earnings. And whenever private jobs are available that is precisely what these N. Y. A. youth do. There is a turn-over of about 10 percent a month on N. Y. A. projects—or in other words a turn-over of around 100 percent a year. To put it another way the number of people who leave N. Y. A. projects in any year is roughly equal to the average number employed at any given time during that year.

This high turn-over rate is good evidence that young people are not making a career out of N. Y. A. jobs but that the National Youth Administration is helping to keep them afloat during that period of unemployment which occurs between the time they leave school and the time they are able to get jobs in industry or agriculture. Even better evidence that youth do want jobs, and do go out and get them when jobs are available, is the fact that between one-third and one-half of the young men and young women who leave N. Y. A. projects do so to take jobs in private industry.

Fitting young people for jobs in private industry by teaching them sound habits of work and giving them basic experience has been one of the outstanding achievements of the National Youth Administration. Many thousands of the young men and young women of today are going to be better workers, better farmers, better parents, and better citizens because of the N. Y. A.

We are considering an appropriation bill and the matter of the cost of this program is of importance. This year the National Youth Administration is operating with an appropriation of $100,000,000 and is maintaining an average monthly employment of 744,000 young people on its student and out-of-school programs. That figures out to a cost of $135 per youth. The N. Y. A. is operating about 30,000 projects, employing on an average of 744,000 youth a month, and doing it with an administrative cost of $5,000,000, or 5 percent, which is adequate testimony of the efficiency of this agency.

Some Members of Congress have raised the question of N. Y. A. extravagance and apparently think that this organization is spending too much money on our youth. The young men and young women employed on the student-work program come from families that have to live on $667 a year. That is the amount for the entire family and it is less than $1.85 a day. I do not know what the average annual family incomes of youth on the out-of-school program is but it is probably lower. If giving jobs to families who live on a budget of that kind, if putting a little purchasing power into their hands to keep body and soul together is waste, then Congress would do well to extend and encourage that brand of waste. Oh, no; that is not waste, but a mighty sound national investment. [Applause.]

The National Youth Administration, far from wasting money, is carrying on a program that is paying benefits far in excess of the dollars spent. N. Y. A. is building up the morale of our young people, preserving and developing their skills, it is cutting down juvenile delinquency, and enriching our communities and our Nation by new schools, new parks, new playgrounds, and thousands of other new facilities that benefit the general public.

In each State and in each community that the National Youth Administration operates a project the local people get the benefit. The young people benefit by having jobs and all that a job means. The local merchants benefit from the increased purchasing power as every dime these youths earn goes through the hands of the butcher or the grocer at some time or other. The whole community benefits from a new school, a new park, a new playground.

In my own State of Oklahoma the N. Y. A. has from the beginning done an outstanding job. Its program has been, and still is, constructive and popular. The recently appointed State director for Oklahoma, Mr. Bruce Carter, is doing an excellent job. He is a young man of vision and courage. He has the support of our people. But, of course, he cannot expand or even maintain the N. Y. A. program without funds.

During the past year in Oklahoma our young people employed on N. Y. A. projects constructed or improved over 3,000 playgrounds and 49 public buildings. These young people constructed or improved 21 swimming and wading pools, 64 athletic fields, and countless other new facilities. Each one of these projects, each one of these new facilities, is of great benefit to the community in which it was made available. At this point I would like to include in my remarks a statement of physical accomplishments by the National Youth Administration in Oklahoma during the last fiscal year.

This year the National Youth Administration is carrying on a program in Oklahoma that in January was providing jobs for 22,578 young people, 13,722 students, and 8,856 out-of-school youth.

A quick glance at the figures for Oklahoma shows the need for expanding the N. Y. A. program by increasing its appropriation rather than curtailing it. On January 5, there were 25,826 youth certified and awaiting assignment to N. Y. A. projects, as compared to 8,856 on N. Y. A. out-of-school projects, or three times as many youth needing such employment as were employed. In addition, there were 35,000 other youth in need of N. Y. A. jobs, although not certified, or a total of 60,826 needy youth in Oklahoma, about three times as many as were employed on the N. Y. A. student and out-of-school programs together. At this point I would like to include in my remarks a statement showing current N. Y. A. operations in Oklahoma.

It is our responsibility to provide our youth with the chance to live and to become part of our living world. It is our duty to our Nation's welfare, the present and the future welfare of the United States, to give our young people the opportunity to earn a livelihood by their own work. The best way we can do that is by increasing the National Youth Administration appropriation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman very much. I have consumed more time than I had intended.

It had been my purpose to discuss in some detail a report of a committee called in Washington last December by Federal Security Administrator Paul V. McNutt, which conference I attended. It was one of the most interesting and thought-provoking conferences held in Washington in many years. It was attended by some of the leading businessmen and financiers of the country. Also, some of the outstanding educators were present. I was deeply impressed by their very earnest discussion. After days of discussions and the compiling of a vast amount of authentic information, that conference appointed a committee to make its report to Congress and the country. Those serious-minded businessmen did not ask for a hundred million dollars or $125,000,000, a figure that some of our self-admitted economy-minded statesmen seem to think is so unreasonably high. But those conservative gentlemen have reported to us that this Congress should make available funds in the amount of at least $200,000,000 for the N. Y. A. next year.

That important report of disinterested businessmen and educators adds that such a sum would not only permit the N. Y. A. student work program to continue at an increased level but would permit the employment of the 300,000 youths who are now certified as unemployed, out of school, and in need.

That report further states, and I quote now from it verbatim:

If the appropriation proposed for the National Youth Administration for the fiscal year 1940–41 is adopted it will be necessary to reduce by 30 percent the funds devoted to aid for students in high schools and colleges and to reduce by at least 10 percent the employment of youths on out-of-school work.

This important report adds finally that a reduction in the appropriation for the National Youth Administration will be nothing less than a disaster. We must prevent that disaster. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the House Subcommittee on Appropriations which conducted hearings on Federal Security Agency Budget estimates, I wish to say a few words about the United States Office of Education and its work.

Congress, in 1867, established the Office of Education—

For the purpose of collecting such statistics and facts as shall show the condition and progress of education in the several States and Territories, and of diffusing such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems, and methods of teaching, as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems, and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country.

For more than 70 years teachers and school officials and the general public have looked to the United States Office of Education for Federal Government service in educational matters. Just as the American farmer looks to the Department of Agriculture for assistance, and as the medical man depends upon the assistance of the Public Health Service, so those interested in our schools and in improved educational programs for our children, young people, and our adult citizens have learned to regard the United States Office of Education as their educational service agency in the Federal Government.

I have been quite impressed with the many types of service this office is called upon to provide. Yet I suppose we cannot expect anything else since American education itself is probably our Nation's largest and most important business.

United States Office of Education statistics reveal that there are more than 33,000,000 men, women, and children who go to school in the United States. That means that 1 of every 4 Americans goes to some kind of school at some time each day.

Surely an activity in which so many of our fellows participate, an activity which reaches into every community in our Nation, would produce thousands of problems. Some of these problems can be solved locally. Others are and can be attacked on a State basis. Many educational problems are of national significance, however. These problems also frequently call for solution and can be solved most effectively only by the Nation's educational service agency which is the United States Office of Education.

In cooperation with national, State, and local organizations of various kinds, working with State departments of education, city and county school systems, superintendents of schools, colleges, and universities, and teachers, the United States Office of Education does its work.

Its specialists in the major fields of education, all selected from civil-service rolls, study educational problems. Results of their research, with recommendations or proposals are made available to teachers, school officials, librarians, and to the public through Office of Education publications and in other ways.

In addition the United States Office of Education makes special surveys upon request. In this connection may I point out that of more than 1,000 recommendations in surveys of higher education made by the Office of Education, 70 percent have been carried out in full or in part by the States or colleges and universities concerned.

Many Office of Education responsibilities have developed from conferences held locally, regionally, or nationally, to consider problems of educational and social significance. Conferences called by the Office of Education bring together leaders in education and in other fields for group thinking. Frequently these leaders suggest the types and extent of cooperation that this Federal agency may offer.

During the past 3 or 4 years United States Office of Education conferences have considered such important problems as the out-of-school, out-of-work youth, conservation education, vocational guidance of Negroes, crime prevention through education, C. C. C. camp education, adult civic education, school records and reports, trade and industrial education, elementary and secondary education. They have discussed the education of physically handicapped children, consumer education, and vocational education. Regional conferences on school-building problems, State school statistics, vocational education, and vocational rehabilitation have been held.

John W. Studebaker, United States Commissioner of Education, emphasized, in his presentation of Office of Education budget estimates to the House Subcommittee on Appropriations that the Office of Education has vigorously focused its program during the past few years on types of education designed to help our people meet some of the crucial social and economic issues. It has also assisted emergency programs directly engaged in meeting emergency issues.

United States Office of Education specialists, for example, helped to launch the emergency-education program—a program that has provided funds to repair thousands of school buildings and has given assistance to schools and educational classes for millions of Americans.

It drafted the initial plans for the student-aid service of the National Youth Administration program.

It planned, and is now directing, the educational programs in our Nation's C. C. C. camps.

It has sponsored locally administered demonstrations of public forums for the discussion of social, political, and economic problems in about 600 communities in practically all of the States. This activity has led to a greater appreciation of our freedoms—freedom of speech and learning. It is the democratic process in action.

The United States Office of Education has successfully shown how radio can be used most effectively for education. In a strictly nonpartisan spirit, series of programs, such as Let Freedom Ring, Americans All—Immigrants All, and Democracy in Action, have emphasized the work and importance of our form of government, have promoted tolerance and international good will, and have stimulated a more meaningful appreciation for the freedoms which are ours under the Constitution.

A recently established occupational information and guidance service in the United States Office of Education helps youths and adults who seek or need counsel and employments.

Through committees representative of labor, employers, and vocational education the Office has improved programs of vocational education carried on with Federal funds.

An Office of Education Library Service Division helps public and school libraries to provide better educational service.

Here is an office that provides Federal service which is needed in every community of our country.

An experimental program designed to give emphasis to the development of community programs for education in home and family living has been initiated in Wichita, Kans. The purpose of these cooperative programs is to enrich the educational offerings in home and family living, to implement the democratic process through educational procedures, and to make available to other communities possible procedures in developing similar programs.

The objectives of the Wichita program are as follows:

First. To evaluate present contributions toward family life education from all organizations and agencies.

Second. To develop an awareness of family life as it now exists in the community and opportunities for further enrichment of family life.

Third. To correlate programs of family life education within and without the schools.

Fourth. To integrate education for family life for all age levels.

Fifth. To stimulate increased interest in family life education.

Sixth. To stimulate individuals to assume responsibility for bringing about improved conditions.

Seventh. To develop procedures for evaluating progress in the program.

A report on developments during the past 9 months in the Wichita community program shows that the garden clubs and the chamber of commerce cooperated with the elementary schools, making it possible for elementary-school children to purchase small red-bud trees so that they might participate in last spring's city-wide beautification project.

The recreation director of the city park board cooperated with the parent-education leaders in acquainting families with the free facilities available within the city for inexpensive family recreation; for example, new picnic areas in the parks, improved swimming-pool facilities, and summer concerts.

Four of the leaders for adult parent education classes were employed part time during the summer months, and secured the cooperation of 134 women who gave of their time and cars in transporting a large group of physically under-par children to the sunshine camp maintain by the park board.

Three classes for household employees were cooperatively provided by the vocational-education division of the public schools, and the public gas and electric light company.

A self-help community center for marginal income or relief families has been developed in the southwest part of the city through the cooperative efforts of the Lend-a-Hand Club of Friends University, and the family life education council. The families recondition clothing and furniture which they can purchase through their work hours. A nursery is maintained for their small children, and child care and guidance is taught to the parents by the person in charge of the children. This undertaking has been so enthusiastically reported by the families who have earned membership in the community center that representatives from about 30 Negro organizations have formed an advisory council, and are organizing a similar community center for the use of Negro families.

Adult classes include work in parent education. There are classes organized in connection with practically all of the public schools in the city. In addition, classes are formed for parents of crippled children and for grandparents.

There are also adult classes in home improvement, food buying, clothing, and consumer education.

The homemaking teachers are making careful study of the courses in junior and senior high school in an attempt to make them more practical, and to better enable young people to assume their responsibilities in the family.

It is not only necessary in our democracy that we provide school facilities but that we do everything possible to make our schools and educational programs equal to the needs of modern times.

We require education to prepare the individual for self-support, for creative work, and to prepare him for intelligent citizenship. Without this preparation the individual will not long respect our democratic ideals and institutions.

The United States Office of Education in many ways is helping the States and local communities to make their educational programs more effective. Through a vigorous promotion of American education, this Office is making a great contribution to American democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL].

SUPPORT THE C. C. C. AND N. Y. A.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, I have consistently endeavored to support a program which would result in achieving some economies in the operation of our Federal Government. I believe most all of us in and out of the Congress have come to the conclusion that we must begin to make retrenchments and curtail costs of government in order not only to do away with the continuing of deficit spending but also to arrive at that point where we may live within our income. After 7 years we are no nearer that goal than we were in the beginning. However, I am not of the opinion that we should attempt to make these savings at the expense of the youth of our country.

There are 500,000 young men and women each year entering manhood and womanhood and going out into the world, many of them with diplomas, seeking a foothold in the industrial and professional life of our country. They seek in vain. There are no openings for them. Many of them are becoming discouraged. Some of them, as we have had reason to learn recently here in Washington, are critical of our democratic processes, and are beginning to question whether our American way will work after all. There are 2 outstanding agencies which we have been carrying forward in an endeavor to help the youth of our Nation—namely, the Civilian Conservation Corps camps, and the National Youth Administration program.

Mr. Chairman, there are 4,000,000 youth in America 18 to 24 years of age unemployed and not in school. It is reported the N. Y. A. costs on an average $268 per year per student. This bill reduces the appropriation from $100,000,000 last fiscal year to $85,000,000 for the ensuing year. This will leave 123,000 youth out of the program. There are now 300,000 certified who cannot be enrolled under the $100,000,000 appropriation. Would it not be better statesmanship to leave out a battleship costing $100,000,000 or a cruiser or two or a few bombers and save our youth from despair and a career of crime?

The plan seems to be now to postpone our defense program and let England and France have our aircraft now being built. If so, why appropriate the money now? They will be outmoded by the time we construct them. Better forego a few such craft and save our boys.

There is an excessive overhead in the C. C. C. administration. High-salaried political employees are securing the money appropriated and the boys are left out of the program. This should be stopped at once and the money spent on the boys themselves. An examination of the record shows the large number of these political employees receiving high salaries. It is significant to note the States from which they come.

In my own western area of the United States, as you well know, we have vast forest areas. The United States is the owner in fee of much of these forest lands. The C. C. C. camps, in the main, are located in these areas in the West, and have been doing a most excellent work in trail and road building, clearing away fire hazards, working in fire patrol, and generally carrying on a constructive program resulting in adding values to our forest areas, and, at the same time, building up and conserving our natural resources.

I have received numerous protests from districts all over the State of Oregon urging that none of the C. C. C. camps be discontinued. I feel that it would be a grievous mistake to discontinue them, not only by reason of the values we are receiving from the moneys expended in the prosecution of this program, but also, in the moral and educational values we are implanting in the youth of our country. Many of them we are taking from the streets where they have had no opportunity for educational or cultural advancement, and with no opportunity to make their own way. They are brought into a wholesome atmosphere out in the broad expanses of our timbered areas in our western country, and are imbued with new energy and new opportunity and a new outlook on life. They are not only broadened in the mental and moral horizon, but they are restored in vigor and health and put on the road to becoming useful citizens.

The same is true with respect to the N. Y. A. program, except that they are not placed in the out of doors, but are given wholesome work to do in a practical way and are educating themselves in schools at a small expense which will return the investment manyfold to our Nation in after years when these young people become a part of the citizenry of the Nation upon whom we must depend to defend our democratic processes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks and to include a report I received last year from Dean Onthank of the University of Oregon giving in some detail the results of the N. Y. A. work in the university.

The report is as follows:

Dean Onthank's letter referred to is as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON,
Eugene, June 9, 1939.

Mr. HOMER ANGELL,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR HOMER: I don't often bother our delegation at Washington. It occurs to me, however, that you might be interested in knowing directly what happens with the National Youth Administration money which is allotted at the University of Oregon, since Congress appropriates for the National Youth Administration and will, I infer, be asked to do so again before long.

We received this last academic year a total of $33,075. Grants were made to students in varying amounts, but rarely exceeding $15 a month, and averaging approximately $11 during the 9-month period. Appointments of students to receive the work grants are made term by term. Between 300 and 325 students were aided thereby each term. About half the students on the list received aid all three terms, many only one term. Students to receive the aid are selected primarily on a basis of necessity for aid in order to stay in college. By that I mean at minimum standards of living, such as are maintained in the student cooperative living groups. National Youth Administration money emphatically does not pay fraternity dues or extravagances of any kind. Students are selected to receive aid secondarily on a basis of quality of university work. The competition for the available places is so keen that we are compelled to select among those whose need is unmistakable.

Naturally the selection is made on a basis of performance in the university or, in the case of new students, of previous school record. No student is selected who is not average with respect to the whole student body, and students above freshman level rarely get on unless they are in the upper quarter of the student body. That means the National Youth Administration is helping a superior group of students to stay in college and do successful work.

The fact that National Youth Administration students are doing not only successful work but outstanding work is evident from the enclosed documents. Enclosure No. 1, which presents the grades of undergraduate students, as compared with the total undergraduate enrollment at the university, shows, as you will see, in the last two columns, that National Youth Administration students get from 8 to 10 times their share of places on the honor roll, as compared with the student body as a whole. Of the students making straight A grades, from one-third to one-half are National Youth Administration students, notwithstanding the fact that they are handicapped by the outside work that they have to do. The second document, a list of scholarships and other distinctions won by National Youth Administration students, shows that they are outstanding not only in scholarship but in a variety of other competitions. Last spring the Koyl cup, going to the most outstanding student at the end of the junior year and the equivalent Gerlinger cup going to women, although not listed here because the girl at the time was not on the National Youth Administration, went to a girl who had been on the National Youth Administration but had been so outstanding that she had been awarded a special scholarship, so had been spared the necessity for doing National Youth Administration work during her junior year. The fact that the two outstanding juniors in the whole university were, in effect, able to stay in college and win the honor by means of National Youth Administration is not without some significance.

I am stressing this point somewhat, because I have heard it said that National Youth Administration aid is given indiscriminately or even as a means of subsidizing athletes. I have no objections to helping athletes, but what help they get from National Youth Administration is gotten on their own merits in competition with others. Relatively few do get help from this source, however much they may get from other sources.

Though the primary purpose of N. Y. A. is to help deserving and able students, the fact that the university is benefited greatly from the help given by N. Y. A. students. The university is spending as much as it ever did from its own funds for student help; but with the increasing pressure on faculty members for off-campus services, the assistance in reading papers and in laboratory and studio has released them very helpfully from some of their routine work for higher-level services. Incidentally, the experience has been a very wholesome and profitable one for the students themselves, apart from the money they have earned. The majority of them are doing jobs in the field in which they are definitely interested and expect some day to practice. The testimony is nearly unanimous that they not only earn their money, but that they are getting a very valuable vocational experience besides.

We are in the process of getting out the annual report of the committee which administers college aid for the University of Oregon. This is a rather detailed report, but if you care to have a copy I will send you one. If you have any questions or comments on this somewhat general statement, I will be very glad to have them. I know you are not unfamiliar with what is going on now, but it occurs to me that you might like to have such items as I have enclosed since it is more specific information than is likely to come to you otherwise.

Sincerely,

KARL W. ONTHANK.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, this report is a plain factual recital which evidences the fact that this work is worth while. It is interesting to note from the report of Dean Onthank that grants rarely exceeded $15 a month per boy over the period covered, and averaged approximately $11 during the 9-month school period. Between 300 and 325 students out of a total registration in excess of 3,000 were aided by this fund each term, and about half of this group of students received aid all three terms; many, however, were receiving aid only one term. This small monthly payment is not used for extravagances, but to cover the necessary living and other similar expenses of the student. They show themselves to be a superior group of students, as shown by the rewards they received. In the group of students referred to by Dean Onthank, the N. Y. A. students had 13.1 percent of their number on the honor roll, whereas the total enrollment there was only 4.2 percent on the honor roll. Although the number of the N. Y. A. students was 10 percent of the total registration, 30.9 percent of all honor-roll students were taken from their number.

I hope that this committee and the House will restore to the bill the appropriations that were allowed in the last fiscal year for these two activities.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK].

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, the present appropriations bill before the House recommends $85,000,000 for the National Youth Administration which is $15,000,000 below what they had last year. Under the appropriations for 1940 they were able to care for 780,000 youths in the United States. If the present recommendation of $85,000,000 is not increased it will mean 125,000 youths will not receive any aid during the fiscal year of 1941.

The average cost per youth, including the administering of the act, is approximately $11 per month, which seems to me to be a very reasonable amount.

I feel it would be false economy to save $15,000,000 at the expense of the youth of this country. For that reason I am going to support an amendment to increase the appropriations for the N. Y. A. to $100,000,000 which I hope will meet with the approval of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I esteem it a great privilege to support the program advocated by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]. I think that the appropriation for the National Youth Administration and for the support of the C. C. C. is one of the great measures of conservation. We are conserving one of the greatest resources we have in educating the youth of this country, and it has been very encouraging in this period of depression, when so many of the youth of the country are denied an opportunity for education, that the strong arm of the Government has reached out through the National Youth Administration to help these young people and has appropriated money to the very people it intends to assist. This appropriation goes direct to assist the youth of the country, the young men, the boys, and the young girls, who have failed to obtain an opportunity for education. They are now given an opportunity to work their way through school by the assistance of the National Youth Administration. Out in my State we are doing wonderful things with the money made available by the appropriations for the N. Y. A. We have schools out there that are taking up these young boys from the local groups and young women and educating them, and giving them qualifications so that they may go forth in the world and make their way and obtain better positions. We have reached a time in the conduct of the business of the Government, in the conduct of the business of private companies, when an education is absolutely a necessity. One of the most pathetic things a Congressman has to deal with is an attempt to assist young people who aspire to better positions, to make up for the deficiencies of an imperfect education.

The files of the congressional offices are full of letters seeking the assistance of Congressmen to help them overcome these deficiencies.

I desire to read certain telegrams and letters that have come to me in support of this legislation. I am in favor of and will support restoration of the full amount of the appropriation for the National Youth Administration and the C. C. C.

I will read a telegram from President Dale, of the University of Idaho, under date of March 16:

MOSCOW, IDAHO, March 16, 1940.

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE,
Washington, D. C.:

Since college rules, regulations, and fees not ordinarily changed within single college generation, proposed drastic N. Y. A. cut most deplorable. Even partially shutting N. Y. A. door at this time simply means termination of ambition of many boys and girls already enrolled in our institution who possess promising intellectual qualification but would find themselves entirely without resources if N. Y. A. reduced. This program has profound social implications, and bears directly on national welfare. Urge your support full restoration present N. Y. A. appropriation, where every dollar counts tremendously.

HARRIS DALE,
President, University of Idaho.

I have a letter from the head of the Boise Junior College, at Boise, Idaho:

BOISE JUNIOR COLLEGE,
Boise, Idaho, March 9, 1940.

Representative COMPTON I. WHITE.
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WHITE: It is my understanding that the college-aid program of the National Youth Administration is to be cut 16.6 percent for the coming year. This program has proved invaluable to the young people above high school, and has enabled them to go on to college when such would not be possible were they denied this opportunity to earn their way as they secure their education.

We have excellent young people at the Boise Junior College earning their way by jobs assigned to them in and around the college, who would not be able to go to school otherwise. These young people cannot find jobs in this region, and if the college-aid program of the National Youth Administration were discontinued, the only alternative open to them would be to lie around home, become dissatisfied, and eventually prove a social problem to their community and the Government.

I think that the few dollars spent on N. Y. A. will prove of exceptional worth to the American Nation. We are taking young people, helping them find a way out, keeping up their morale, and thus developing full-rounded personalities, able to battle their way through the complexities of life. It is my measured judgment that the money spent for N. Y. A. by the Federal Government will be repaid tenfold by the type of a citizen that Government has during the coming generation.

I hope that you can see fit to support this National Youth Administration program, and I shall be glad to furnish any data that may help you to understand how it works here in Idaho.

Sincerely yours,

EUGENE B. CHAFFEE, President.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the committee has reported the full amount recommended by the President and his Budget?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. That is my understanding, but I understand that the Budget cut the amount $15,000,000.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman understands also that the President, in recommending his Budget to the Congress, recommended that cut of $15,000,000?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I understand that the Bureau of the Budget made such a recommendation. I want to say to the gentleman it is my idea that it lies with this House of Representatives to determine which is the most meritorious and the most important items in an appropriation bill, and lend full measure of support to those items.

Mr. KEEFE. I was just wondering, having heard the gentleman urge support of the President on many occasions, whether or not he is departing from his usual support of the President in this instance?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I think the President has been 100-percent right on many occasions, but when I disagree with the President, I am willing to stand by my own judgment.

Mr. KEEFE. And in this case the gentleman thinks the President is wrong?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. It is my judgment that we are here conserving one of the greatest assets which the Nation has, namely, the youth of this Nation.

Mr. KEEFE. I heartily agree with the gentleman's conclusion in that regard, but responsibility for the cut ought to be placed by the gentleman where it belongs, not on the Appropriations Committee or the subcommittee, but exactly where it belongs, on the Budget which the President submitted.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. It is the opinion of the gentleman from Idaho that responsibility for making appropriations rests primarily with the Appropriations Committee and the great House of Representatives, by advice of the President of the United States. I do not concede that any bureau, call it Budget or otherwise, supersedes the functions of the great Committee on Appropriations. That is my position.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Idaho will recollect that the N. Y. A. came into being under the present administration against the opposition of the Republican Party at that time, and the gentleman from Idaho, as I understand it, is not only with the President, but the gentleman from Idaho feels that the appropriation should go further, having in mind particularly the fact that this is one of the most meritorious activities engaged in in this emergency, and that it has been tremendously successful.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. It has; and the gentleman has stated the position correctly.

I want to read a letter from the superintendent of public instruction of the State of Idaho:

SALMON, IDAHO, March 16, 1940.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress:

Urge you oppose any reduction in appropriation for National Youth Administration. This has been very beneficial to Idaho underprivileged children.

ALLEN C. MERRITT,
State Committeeman.
(Former Idaho State Commissioner of Public Works.)

PETITION FOR INCREASED N. Y. A. APPROPRIATIONS

Whereas 106,000 American youth will be denied the opportunity for education fitting them to take their places as useful citizens in our society by the Budget at present up for consideration before the Congress of the United States, which will cut $15,000,000 off the appropriation for the National Youth Administration, we, as young people of the State of Idaho and citizens of the United States, protest this cut as a measure of unwise economy. According to a recent survey, 59 percent of American youth desire more vocational guidance and training. The only place where this guidance and training can be had at present is the N. Y. A. program. We regard the continuance of this program of preparing American youth for effective, constructive citizenship as useful members of our society a vital program to the future of this Nation. Therefore, as the only proven practical method of providing this training, we ask that increased N. Y. A. appropriations be made as the best national defense and for the prevention of poverty and crime.

IDAHO YOUTH CLUB.

I have read the above resolution of the Idaho Youth Club and understand its significance and great importance to me; I therefore concur in this resolution and petition Congress to grant the additional funds asked for N. Y. A.

Signed by 420 members of the Idaho Youth Club.

WEISER, IDAHO, March 15, 1940.

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Congressional Office Building:

We urge strongly you use your influence to keep N. Y. A. school at Weiser operating at same high level. This is one Government activity that meets with the approval of a big majority of the people.

JOHN FAGERSTED.

REXBURG, IDAHO, March 16, 1940.

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Representative:

Sentiment here overwhelmingly favors continuance of N. Y. A. program without curtailments.

D. W. NELSON,
Chairman, Madison County Democrats.

OROFINO, IDAHO, March 19, 1940.

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Washington, D. C.:

Urge N. Y. A. appropriation not be reduced for next year as we believe this program does a great deal for youth.

J. L. HOUX.

Reduction of funds for N. Y. A. and student aid here would work great hardship on 50 high-school pupils and 25 other homes from which N. Y. A. help comes. This Federal aid has been very valuable to this entire valley. Your help before committee appreciated.

GEM COUNTY DEMOCRATIC CENTRAL COMMITTEE,
Emmett, Idaho, February 12, 1940.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
United States Representative,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR MR. WHITE: I wish to call to your particular attention the National Youth Administration. We, the people of Emmett and of Idaho, feel that a great deal of good is being accomplished for our young folks by this program. Our boys and girls are being given opportunities by the National Youth Administration which is undoubtedly worth more than the actual dollars and cents which it is costing. Our youth of today are going to be our leaders of tomorrow. If we can teach them to be good leaders and install in them a feeling of confidence, good citizenship, honesty, etc., and at the same time teach them to be self-supporting, I believe we have really done something.

We hope that you will be able to support this measure. I would also like to mention the fact that I believe the general public, Republicans as well as Democrats, look upon the National Youth Administration as a nonpartisan measure and feel that it is very worth while.

With best personal regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

HOWARD V. EATON,
State Committeeman.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,

Re: Appropriation for National Youth Administration.

DEAR MR. WHITE: I understand that it is proposed to reduce the appropriation for the National Youth Administration.

I think that organization is doing fine work in assisting the sons and daughters of poor people to acquire a sufficient education to meet the needs of the times and to make them self-sustaining. I happen to know the work that is being done in this part of the State. Several of these boys and girls are attending the Boise Junior College, and except for the assistance they get from the National Youth Administration they would not be able to do so.

I hope cuts in appropriations may be made in connection with matters that are not so important and vital as the education of our young people.

Regards.
Sincerely yours,

OLIVER O. HAGA.

STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION AND BOARD OF REGENTS, UNIVERSITY OF IDAHO,
Boise, March 16, 1940.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN WHITE: Inasmuch as the N. Y. A. Federal appropriation bill is now up before Congress for consideration, I wish to lend my endorsement to this very fine program that has been carried on in Idaho during the past few years.

I feel sure that hundreds of young people have had an opportunity to attend school and find desirable employment through the agency of the N. Y. A. who never have otherwise received these privileges.

We are hopeful that Congress will not see fit to reduce the appropriation below what it was the last year.

Anything that you can do to secure this appropriation will be greatly appreciated by the educators of Idaho.

Yours very truly,

J. W. CONDIE,
State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Under permission to revise and extend these remarks in the RECORD at this point, I insert a telegram from former Idaho State Commissioner of Public Works Allen C. Merritt, and a copy of a petition which I have received from the Idaho Youth Club, signed by some 420 members, and referred to the House Committee on Appropriations, together with the following telegrams and letters from prominent businessmen and educational leaders of Idaho.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein certain telegrams, letters, and communications received in support of this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho will have to obtain permission in the House to include extraneous matter.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. This goes to the matters considered by this Committee and is entirely relevant to the issue before the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Permission to include telegrams and letters may not be obtained in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman will have to prefer his request in the House after the Committee rises.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute to correct an impression left in the RECORD by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], who indicated in his statement that the N. Y. A. was created despite the objections of the Republican Party. I do not think the gentleman, who is usually very sincere and very honest, intends to leave that impression as a fact. The fact is that the N. Y. A. was created by the President of the United States by Executive order, through the allocation of funds in 1936 out of the relief appropriations made by Congress. It seems to me that to leave the impression that the original creation of the N. Y. A. was fought by the Republican Party is leaving an impression that does not accord with the facts in the case.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. What the gentleman says, from a historical angle, is true, but there are other facts involved.

The Republican Party in the main has always opposed W. P. A. appropriations. Last year 98 percent of the Republican membership, with a combination of 30 or 40 Democrats, massacred the W. P. A. appropriation bill, and you are going to try and do it again this year.

Mr. KEEFE. I presume the gentleman is the authority for the statement I heard over the radio from a news commentator the other night that the Republican Party is fighting the N. Y. A. I want to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts that here stand the two Republican members of the subcommittee that has this appropriation in charge, and these Republican members intend to vote for the N. Y. A. appropriation. I think the gentleman's innuendo and insinuation is absolutely wrong. If any cut is to be made in the N. Y. A., or if a cut is finally accomplished, it will not be by the work of the Republican members of this subcommittee but the work of the President of the United States who submitted a budget to the Congress and asked the Congress to adopt it—$15,000,000 less than the Budget last year.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman intend to vote for the amendment that will increase the item to $100,000,000?

Mr. KEEFE. I intend first to vote to support the report of the committee. I want the gentleman to know that I favor the N. Y. A.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman favor the $100,000,000 appropriation?

Mr. KEEFE. Just one moment. I shall take the floor at the proper time and make a statement of my views on the subject. Then I will answer the gentleman so there will be no question of exactly where I stand.

Mr. McCORMACK. But the appropriate time is only 24 hours off. The gentleman certainly must have made up his mind about this question now.

Mr. KEEFE. Oh, yes; I have made up my mind. It has been made up for weeks, and it has been in the press for at least 3 weeks. I suppose the gentleman has not read that.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Massachusetts, of course, finds it difficult to follow the gentleman from Wisconsin; he moves with such rapidity that he is interesting and refreshing. But my question was a very simple one, whether the gentleman would support the amendment increasing the fund to $100,000,000 when it is offered. It is a simple question and calls for a simple and direct answer.

Mr. KEEFE. I do not know that I am called upon to answer the gentleman at this time.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman does not have to answer, of course, if he does not want to.

Mr. KEEFE. I have indicated to the gentleman that I shall make a statement at the proper time in which the gentleman's question will be answered directly.

Mr. McCORMACK. I respect my friend, even though we may disagree, because I have a wholesome regard for his views.

Mr. KEEFE. We do not disagree.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think on this occasion, however, my friend, having already made up his mind, could answer whether he intends to vote for the amendment increasing the N. Y. A. appropriation to $100,000,000 when it is offered on the floor.

Mr. KEEFE. I think the gentleman is a little unfair.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman really mean to use the word "unfair"?

Mr. KEEFE. He knows that I am a member of this subcommittee.

Mr. McCORMACK. Would not the gentleman prefer to say "premature"?

Mr. KEEFE. It is a little premature because the gentleman knows I am a member of this committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. KEEFE. When the time comes I will state my views on the floor definitely.

Mr. McCORMACK. Prior to that I shall assume that the gentleman intends to support his own committee.

Mr. KEEFE. I intend to support the committee at the start.

Mr. McCORMACK. That means the gentleman will vote for $85,000,000?

Mr. KEEFE. Let me ask the gentleman in this time——

Mr. McCORMACK. In the gentleman's own time.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. Was I not correct in my statement, generally?

Mr. McCORMACK. Historically, but from the angle of actual facts, the basic facts, the appropriations, the opposition——

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman can see that if his great party wanted to give $100,000,000 to N. Y. A. all that would have been necessary was for the President of the United States to recommend $100,000,000 to his Budget. Am I not correct in this?

Mr. McCORMACK. If we follow the gentleman's reasoning that he relies upon the recommendation of the President, the gentleman would vote to sustain the President's recommendations en bloc. In practice, however, the gentleman votes to reduce the recommendations of the President. When the President sends a recommendation to Congress, it is within the power of Congress to do whatever it wants—increase or decrease. The gentleman from Wisconsin knows that just as well, if not better, than I do.

Mr. KEEFE. I understand, but the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. McCORMACK. But I have answered the gentleman's question directly and flatly.

Mr. KEEFE. It would have been perfectly simple for the President had he wanted $100,000,000 for N. Y. A. to have recommended $100,000,000 in his Budget. Is not that true?

Mr. McCORMACK. Would the gentleman have voted for it?

Mr. KEEFE. I would vote for the bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman would?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Then, if the gentleman would vote for it had the President recommended it why will he not vote for the increased $15,000,000 though the President did not recommend it?

Mr. KEEFE. Perhaps I will when the vote comes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad to hear that because the gentleman a moment ago said he was going to support the committee.

Mr. KEEFE. I believe in N. Y. A. just as much as the gentleman does; but I am not making a campaign speech here on the floor this afternoon on N. Y. A.

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope the gentleman does make a campaign speech. I have no objection to it. I make them here occasionally. It is very refreshing to know that there is one Member of the House who does not make a campaign speech when he is on the floor.

Mr. KEEFE. I do not yield any further at this time.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin, I feel it is appropriate I should say, in view of the colloquy which has taken place, that in the subcommittee which considered this appropriation and brought it to the floor there was no suggestion of partisanship. The matter of which members of the committee were Republicans and which members were Democrats did not arise, and there were no two members of the subcommittee who were apparently more sympathetically interested in the provision of reasonable appropriations for the National Youth Administration than the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin. I regret very much that any suggestion has been made that there is involved in the consideration of this appropriation bill any sort of partisan issue.

I have no objection to answering the gentleman from Massachusetts insofar as I am concerned as to whether I will vote to increase the Budget estimate by $15,000,000 for this purpose, and I answer it as one of the Members of the House who is perhaps as sympathetically interested in the objectives of the National Youth Administration as anyone could possibly be and as a Member of the House who is thoroughly convinced that the work of that organization is extremely worthy and ought to be continued in an orderly way. But in view of the present financial condition of the Government and in view of the recommendation made by the President himself in the transmission of his Budget to the Congress, I as the chairman of this subcommittee shall not vote to increase the N. Y. A. appropriation above the Budget estimate, $85,000,000, and I am convinced that no member of the subcommittee will vote to do it. I believe that those who are urging that the appropriation be increased to $100,000,000 are really not acting in the interest of the organization which they profess to be endeavoring to help, but that a more reasonable appropriation at this time would be conducive to the eventual welfare of the N. Y. A.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Georgia is certainly laboring under a very serious misapprehension in his interpretation of the colloquy between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself.

Mr. TARVER. I certainly hope I am.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not think the gentleman from Wisconsin for a moment thought I was accusing him of playing partisan politics on this occasion. We were discussing the history in connection with the development of the N. Y. A. Back in those days when we were fighting to make appropriations for the W. P. A.—and last year, as a matter of fact, when these appropriations came before the House, N. Y. A. was connected with the W. P. A. appropriation—the Republicans were very careful to see that the minimum amount was appropriated. The gentleman says that I injected politics into this discussion. The gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the colloquy between the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Wisconsin speaks for itself, and I do not care to make any further reference to it. I stated, and I repeat, that it is the first suggestion of partisanship which has come into the consideration of this bill so far, either in the subcommittee or in the full committee, and I certainly hope the matter of making reasonable provision for the N. Y. A. may be decided by the House without the consideration of partisan differences, and that there may be no crimination and recrimination as to responsibility for what may have occurred heretofore.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to observe that it is true that the Republicans along with a number of Democrats voted for certain W. P. A. appropriations. I have no knowledge of the Director of the W. P. A. coming in here and asking for additional funds for the current year. Apparently the appropriation made for W. P. A. has proven to be sufficient. Neither the President nor the Director, Colonel Harrington, has asked for additional appropriations for the current year.

Under these conditions I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Republicans and the Democrats who voted for those appropriations have proved correct in their votes. In regard to N. Y. A., I may say that certainly it is by far the most desirable and the best of all the agencies recommended; however, we lose sight of the fact that from the time the New Deal came into power in 1932, it has been promising a solution to the problems facing the American people. The New Deal said the depression would end, but the depression has not ended. I have here a quotation from the C. I. O. pointing out that there are 12,000,000 unemployed people today in the United States. There were 10,000,000 unemployed people when President Roosevelt became President of the United States. In these discussions we lose sight of the point that no solution of our domestic problems has been found.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, even though we have spent over $20,000,000,000 in an effort to solve these problems, we have been throwing good money after bad trying the same old stunt over and over again. But nothing in the way of a permanent solution has been found. That is the point. After N. Y. A. what? After W. P. A. what? We should get our people back into private industry, back into regular jobs at regular pay. That is the American way, that is the American program, and any other method, whether it be W. P. A. or anything else, certainly is not of permanent value, and is not of permanent benefit to the American people. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS].

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, once upon a time, before a monster called depression knocked us in the solar plexus, this country had an income of over $80,000,000,000. As we look back upon those days, it seems, in view of our struggles today, that we must have been riding high on the swell of prosperity in the 1920's. The facts are—and Government figures will bear me out on this point—that even in 1928 and 1929 we were nowhere near using our full plant capacity. The great mass of incomes, even in those years, were not sufficiently high to enable most Americans to buy and use all the goods and services which should have been available to them, in view of the American standard of living.

Today we are painfully aware that something is vitally wrong, because the unemployment problem has been steadily growing worse. Yet nothing basic, nothing real has been done to solve that problem. Our national income continues to stagger along slowly in the lower brackets. Our increased population has been largely an increase of men and women of working age.

I am drawing upon personal experiences of 16 years as a high-school teacher to tell you that the principal cause of unemployment and low national income today is that the young people of our Nation are leaving school without being fully prepared for definite jobs. I have known this for many years and have constantly urged such revision of our public-school system as will provide a real system of vocational guidance and training.

Recently there came into my hands a report published by the Educational Policies Commission of the National Education Association. This report is entitled, "Education and Economic Well-Being in American Democracy." It may be obtained in this city at the headquarters of the National Education Association on Sixteenth Street. I urge every Member of Congress to get this report and read it thoughtfully. It is sound, logical, and convincing. It offers a program for a basic educational attack on unemployment. The American people, I believe, will back this program to the limit. It is, and I speak to you frankly, the first plan I have seen which offers hope that the American Nation will rise triumphantly over its troubles and move steadily forward toward the greater achievements of a positive, dynamic economy.

High productivity and adequate education go together. All economists agree that this is true. But we must not simply blindly increase the amount of education which we will offer to the youth of our land. Each boy and girl presents a different and unique personality. Capabilities vary. There are some who should have all the advanced training obtainable in this country. There are a larger number who can use to advantage at least 2 years of training beyond high school. I agree heartily with the Educational Policies Commission that the boy or girl of average ability in this country today should have the advantages of junior college, with particular emphasis placed on vocational training during the last 2 or 3 years of schooling. The rule that boys and girls should be trained for definite jobs and be ready to fill these before they leave school is a rule which we should adopt without delay.

Today there is a shortage of skilled labor in many industries. There is likewise a shortage of many types of goods and services which can be produced only by skilled labor. The more highly skilled workers we have in this country, the more money we shall have. This is true both because the average personal income will rise with an increase in skilled labor and because our productivity snowballs as a result of training and knowledge. This does not mean that unskilled labor is unnecessary to us. Probably our whole system would collapse without some workers who offer unskilled manpower of the strictly brawn type. But we have too many laborers who are untrained and unskilled.

Among what class of workers is there greatest unemployment today? You know the answer. By far the greatest proportion of them are unskilled. Yet there is little chance, as things stand, to increase our numbers of skilled workers unless we increase education and plan it very carefully. A high output per worker is associated with a high level of education, vocational intelligence, and skill—never the reverse.

Vocational guidance and training is a topic widely misunderstood today. It is not something totally distinct and separate from basic education, but is a training which should proceed side by side with the study of reading, writing, arithmetic, civics, and science. Even in the primary grades prevocational training should begin with the cultivation in the child of good work habits—concentration, punctuality, neatness, and care of tools. In later grades, when the pupils are learning something of employer-employee relations and facts about the workaday world, as they should be in the ideal set-up, they should be likewise becoming proficient in certain mechanical skills. We cannot neglect science or mechanical skills in the schools of today, because this world in which we live is increasingly dependent on science and machinery, and so are all of us who live in it.

Eventually, in the ideal school set-up of today, there should come a time when the pupil should consult with his vocational adviser to decide "in just what job will I be happiest and most productive?" Together pupil and teacher must then determine the definite preparation which the boy or girl must receive.

Here we come to a vital point. We do not want to train children for jobs that are today overcrowded or poorly paid. How may we know what are the opportunities today, and what the opportunities will be tomorrow?

I am told that the Bureau of Labor has recently initiated an occupational survey, which perhaps may eventually answer this question. Certainly the problem must be met adequately, if we are to proceed with vocational training with some assurance that our efforts will be rewarded. Everybody today wants to know where the good jobs are; where there are promising openings for a great number of workers. Two young men named Lyle Spencer and Robert Burns have set up an organization in Chicago and in a small way are attempting to analyze occupational trends. This is good as far as it goes, but we need something which is country-wide in scope—accurate, dependable, scientific.

Once the schools have this information they will know better how to proceed in the matter of providing more semi-skilled and highly skilled workers.

Our problem is one of raising incomes so that we may have widespread distribution and consumption of goods and services, which we now have the plant capacity to produce. There is but one way to raise incomes, and that is to increase the numbers of our highly skilled and semiskilled workers. How can we increase our numbers of highly skilled and semi-skilled workers? Industry and labor may help on this program by developing adequate apprentice systems. Industrial schools, night schools, C. C. C. camps, and other governmental agencies may do their share. But on the public schools and colleges inevitably falls the largest share of responsibility for turning out graduates who have mechanical skills and training for work which pays good financial returns, because it is training which has increased productivity.

Employers are always interested in prospective employees who furnish lists of skills in which those seeking work are efficient. I believe that there will always be a demand for good welders, mechanics, printers, carpenters, painters, bricklayers, plumbers, cooks, bakers, tailors, operators of business machines, statisticians, office managers, business administrators, laboratory assistants, and so on. But we must have more knowledge of industry's needs, demands, and requirements as of today and as of tomorrow if we are to proceed with intelligence. We Americans are a strangely stubborn people at times. Faced with this colossal illness called unemployment, we have tried to cure it with sugar-coated pills instead of seeking out the basic cause of sickness and finding a cure which is a cure. The educational cure is not a quick cure. We may only just begin to see results 5 years after we have taken steps to revise and improve our school system. Yet we must take the long view. We must think ahead to 1945, 1950, 1960. No nation was ever so poor that it could not afford good public education. Our public schools are far from being adequate today. We have even cut school budgets severely. In 1936 public education received only 14 percent of the Nation's expense budget, as compared to 22 percent in 1930. This reduction was made in the face of a greatly increased school enrollment, due in large part to the unemployment of our youth. In other words, many hundreds of thousands of additional children have been clamoring for instruction, and there has been less money than before with which to do the job.

Education is not the sole answer to a renewed prosperity. It is, however, a vitally important basic step in the right direction. There are figures and studies available showing conclusively that those States which spend the most for education now will have the greatest per capita wealth in years to come.

You may tell me, Mr. Chairman, that there are many States today which simply cannot load more taxes upon their people in order to give the children the adequate schools we must provide to meet the needs of 1940.

If this is true, then the Federal Government must step in to give such grants-in-aid as will enable us to educate all our children well, giving to each child that amount of training and that kind of training which will fit him to compete in the business world of today to the extent of his ability.

The time has come to reinvest in education, because it is such an important tool for establishing economic security. The time has come to cease drifting and to face realities. The time has come to put out money where it will do most good in banishing forever the scourge of 1940—unemployment. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, all over this country hundreds of thousands of young men and women are looking to the Congress of the United States to give them an opportunity to earn a living. All these young people ask is the same chance that our fathers and our grandfathers had, the same chance that you and I had; that is, the chance to work.

Let us not be fooled into thinking that by asking this they are asking anything unusual or departing from what we call the American tradition of self-reliance. In the days when we and our fathers were growing up young men and women looked to this same Congress to give them a chance, and it was given to them. They looked to Washington for land, and this land was meted out to them. Congress gave each of them 160 acres of fertile land, and this was the start the young people of that day needed.

You may not remember it, but it is a historical fact that from 1865 down to 1890 Congress gave away land amounting to more in area than the total of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, and half of Kentucky combined.

Today we are considering the same proposition, that of giving young people the start they need, and since we have no land to give away we are going about it a little differently and appropriating money to provide jobs on public works. There is nothing new about that.

Our fathers got a chance to go out and earn a quarter of a section of land by working it, and today we are giving some of our youth a chance to earn wages by going out and working. In the past the work that our fathers did on their homesteads was for their own benefit, and they and their families reaped the fruits of their labor.

Today when we give youth a chance to work on public projects by the National Youth Administration the entire country, villages, cities, and rural communities are getting the benefit of their labor. The parks and the playgrounds, the schools and the hospitals, and the many other things these young people have built benefit every one of us.

We can, if we want to ignore completely all the benefits that these N. Y. A. jobs bring to our young people, and on a strictly selfish basis, regard the money we are spending through the National Youth Administration as the investment that is going to pay us the highest rate of interest.

About a third of the total of our young men and women are unable to find jobs. This is an indictment against somebody, and I contend it is an indictment against the American Congress for not finding a solution to the problem. Their number is probably between four and five million—I am talking about the unemployed—and there are perhaps a million more who have only part-time jobs.

These are the young people who are going to have to carry on our industry, agriculture, and our Government when old age pushes us out of the picture. These are the young men who are going to have to guide the destinies of this Nation in peace and in war, and it is up to us to fit them for the task we are going to expect them to do. We cannot shirk our responsibility by trying to smut up some official of the Government, as I understand will be tried later on.

The National Youth Administration is one of the agencies that is helping to fit our young people for this task. It is the agency that is helping them to stay in school, helping them to learn a trade, teaching them how to work and to do a good job, and otherwise making useful citizens out of young men and young women who otherwise would be forced to grow up in idleness and neglect.

To carry on with this work the National Youth Administration needs an appropriation proportionate to the needs it has to meet. We are giving the National Youth Administration the responsibility of doing this job, and it is up to us to give them the money with which to do it. This year the National Youth Administration has an appropriation of $100,000,000. May I add that this $100,000,000 came from the Congress, and not from the Appropriations Committee. It established a legislative policy and fixed a minimum amount with which to do the job. It is infinitely more binding upon us than the whims of some single assistant Budget director, even admitting that he is a good man. Members have referred to this as the President's Budget, but all of us that have sense enough to get out of the rain know full well that the President does not carry in his head all the items carried in all appropriation bills. Furthermore, we as members of the Appropriations Committee cannot shirk our responsibilities because we know full well that every time we write an appropriation bill we reduce items of appropriations and likewise we raise some of them.

We have had plenty of experience right in our own offices to show that these young people want a chance to work and need jobs—any kind of jobs. All kinds of young people come to us—fine, intelligent young Americans—and there is little we can do for them because there are no jobs in Governmental circles.

Most important to young people is the opportunity for jobs and education. This is something that the National Youth Administration is doing for them, and doing well. The immediate responsibility of the Congress to the youth of America is to appropriate to the National Youth Administration $100,000,000, which is the same amount the Congress appropriated last year.

In order to present facts regarding the National Youth Administration operations in each State, the District of Columbia, and New York City, I am submitting the following tables which give State allotments and employment in the student work program, and the out-of-school youth project program; the types of work being performed and the employment in each work category; and a listing of the amount of work accomplished by N. Y. A. project youths during the last fiscal year.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, the squandering for travel expense of Government officials is still going on. There are many individuals in the Federal service who keep well abreast of the "galloping hounds of waste." I refer to the 52 officers of the National Youth Administration who propose to travel at Uncle Sam's expense next year and have asked for an average of $8,100 each in expense money. Besides the 52 officers, the balance of the 1,965 employees of the National Youth Administration have 592 automobiles at their disposal. No doubt this will be news to the taxpayers who pay the bills. Santa Claus and the New Deal are still synonymous to these roving ambassadors of the new order, wherein we all will spend and nobody earn.

See page 621, part 2, hearings, testimony of Aubrey Williams, and so forth. In the table at the bottom of the page the travel expenses for 52 officers on an annual basis is estimated at $421,200. This amounts to $8,100 per officer per year, or, on a basis of 313 working days in the year, not counting vacations, holidays, or other factors, a sum equal to $28.43 per day. Now, this means that for every hour in the working day or night, the officer will have $1.18 of travel allowance to use up. Each one of them could take a de luxe trip around the world on that allowance.

It would be pretty nice if Members of Congress could be allowed $28.43 a day for traveling expenses. It would probably be worth it if some of them were gone for good.

Day and night the waste goes on while we in Congress are asleep. A day of reckoning will come, gentlemen—a day of reckoning will come.

Besides the huge sum spent for travel expense, the N. Y. A. also has 592 automobiles to service the activities of the balance of its 1,965 employees who do not enjoy these extensive travel privileges. See page 625 of the hearings.

The cuts in the N. Y. A. appropriation recommended in the bill are in the wrong places. The bureaucrats are well taken care of by getting their salaries and expenses increased from $4,979,240 to $5,290,000 for 1941. Let us put in an amendment to cut this administrative expense by $300,000 or more.

I have gone through this measure, and it looks to me as if this is a pretty good bill on which to apply the paring knife. I cannot see any sense in reducing the appropriation for N. Y. A. so far as their activities go out in the field, but here you turn around and double the amount that shall become available for the officer personnel. To me this does not make good sense. I do not think it is fair to the youth of America whom we are trying to benefit, and when the time comes I shall offer a suitable amendment to make the necessary cuts.

I think we ought to reduce the number of automobiles provided for. There is no sense in a little organization like this having nearly 600 automobiles to drive in; and that reminds me that the matter of furnishing official cars is rapidly assuming the proportions of a national scandal. About 2 years ago I had occasion to look into the matter of vehicular transportation costs of this Government, and you will be surprised, I know, when I tell you that there are considerably in excess of 100,000 automobiles owned by Uncle Sam that are used for official and unofficial purposes.

Last spring, in Brunswick, Ga., I saw a large limousine car pull up in front of the hotel, having a tax-exempt tag. In talking with the chauffeur, I found they had been in Florida spending several weeks. That car belonged to the Government. It was on its way back to Washington with the official and his family. I have often regretted I did not think to inquire whether the chauffeur was getting his salary from the Government.

When we come to analyze all this spending, we must agree that this New Deal outfit has been the most expensive, the most extravagant administration we have ever had. It is no wonder that the Roosevelt administration has spent more money since it got into power than did all the Presidents from George Washington to Woodrow Wilson, and that includes the prosecution of the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and a number of Indian uprisings. As a matter of fact, the Roosevelt administration has spent an amount equal to 58 percent of all the money that this Government has collected from the time it was organized. This is not a very good record on which to go before the people, and yet you blindly follow the New Deal. You blindly vote the appropriations that it asks for. You blindly condone the extravagances and the wastes that are worse than a scandal; but some day, and not very far hence, the taxpayers of this country are going to demand an accounting, and I am thinking that it will be on November 5.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. I know the gentleman wants to be fair, and is it not a fact——

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly, I want to be fair.

Mr. HOUSTON. The House has tried to effect some economies at this session, but the Senate put it all back in one bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. The trouble is not with the Senate alone. The blame must be placed on both Houses of the Congress. You have blindly voted the President unheard-of powers, you have set up needless bureaus and commissions, the cost of which is running into the millions and millions of dollars. No effort was made to ascertain whether they were necessary and the gentleman cannot escape his share of it. If the gentleman will go through his voting record, he will find he has been a pretty consistent follower of the New Deal and has voted for practically everything the New Deal has asked for.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to admit that I voted for a great many of the appropriations of the New Deal and I voted against a good many of them, but I am pleased to hear the gentleman express himself, because I am sure he will sustain the committee in the action it has taken on the pending bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. The National Youth Administration has 592 automobiles for the officials to travel around in. I cannot see why the Government should furnish these officials with automobiles any more than they should furnish Members of Congress with automobiles. I do not know how many automobiles the Government owns, or pays for the operation of, but I do know that the number runs into astronomical figures.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to page 3 of the report on the present bill where we limit the use of automobiles to official business only.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. KNUTSON. You are not going to cut out this joy riding at the expense of the taxpayers until you put letters a foot high on every car, designating the bureau to which it belongs.

Mr. HOUSTON. And I may say that we have called the attention of the bureaus to that very thing on page 4, with respect to the lettering on official automobiles.

Mr. KNUTSON. What size letters?

Mr. HOUSTON. Conspicuous letters, so they can be seen.

Mr. KNUTSON. One thing would be conspicuous to you, while another sort of lettering would be conspicuous to Mr. Ickes, who does not want any lettering at all. I think these letters ought to be at least four inches high and an inch wide, so you can read them. We do not want any small lettering so a little dust will cover them up. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute. With reference to the lettering on automobiles of the name of the department, which the gentleman from Minnesota has just been discussing, I point out to the gentleman that that matter is controlled by a provision in the United States Code. If the gentleman feels that that provision is not sufficient to secure protection of Government property, I think his duty would be to introduce a bill to correct the section of the code so as to provide the statute law that he holds ought to be enacted. May I ask the gentleman why he has not introduced a bill of that kind?

Mr. KNUTSON. And I say to the gentleman from Georgia that is an abuse which has grown up under the New Deal. I defy the gentleman to point to a single bill introduced by a Republican that had for its object a reduction in the expenditures of the Government that was ever reported out by a committee.

Mr. TARVER. The abuse to which the gentleman refers has been going on for a number of years, long prior to this administration, and there has been no effort on the part of the gentleman's party when in power to enact additional legislation to correct this matter. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, this bill as presently written provides for the reduction in the number of C. C. C. camps in the United States from 1,500 to 1,282 camps. This means an elimination of 218 camps. The original proposal was to eliminate 273 camps but by making certain economies in personnel and economies of management, it is hoped that at least 55 camps, which otherwise would be closed, might be saved. Whether this can be accomplished remains yet to be seen. I have talked with those who know the C. C. C. program throughout the United States and these experts with whom I have spoken doubt very much that the economies suggested by the committee in its report can be adopted to such an extent as to save 55 C. C. C. camps throughout the United States.

It is my thought that if because of economies it is necessary to close any camps in the United States no new camp should be opened except in place of a camp whose work has been completed. In other words, Mr. McEntee has testified in the hearings that it costs the Civilian Conservation Corps from $13,000 to $24,000 to move a camp from one place to another. Until the work of a camp is completed, to move the camp adds to the cost of operation by this amount and since under these circumstances a camp might be removed before work is completed in order to carry on the program, the additional cost of change is sustained.

Mr. Chairman, I have drafted an amendment which I have proposed to be submitted to the paragraph of this bill covering the C. C. C. appropriation. This amendment:

Provided, That the funds herein appropriated shall be used insofar as possible to continue the work of existing camps and no new camps shall be established, and no camps shall be moved, until the work of the presently existing camps shall have been completed.

It is my thought that this amendment would have the effect of requiring the work in the camps now existing to be fully completed before removal. I do not believe any new camps should be opened at a time when camps are being closed throughout the United States because of economy measures.

After writing this amendment and studying the parliamentary rules of the House of Representatives in reference to amendments on appropriation bills, I am convinced that it is subject to a point of order. Rather than present to the House, therefore, an amendment which I know at the outset would be stricken out by a point of order, I merely bring my thoughts before this body in the hope that at a later date the United States Senate, whose rules are different from ours, may consider the matter with a view toward preventing new camps being established while the work is pending in camps being closed for economy reasons.

Mr. Chairman, the Civilian Conservation Corps has been in existence since 1935. During that time it has made an enviable record. Over 13,000,000 persons have received direct benefits from the establishment of this program and over 2,615,000 young men have been trained during long periods of time by the C. C. C. It is estimated that more than 1,700,000,000 forest trees have been planted on nearly 3,500,000 acres of land and that millions of acres of farm land have been adapted by painstaking and well-planned work to the prevention of soil erosion.

In my part of the country, the soil conservation C. C. C. camps have done a magnificent job. Under the guidance of skillful and conscientious supervisors, the young men of the C. C. C. have gone out in the fields and in the valleys of northwest Louisiana and revitalized thousands upon thousands of acres of worn-out farm land. The building of the little dams to check the wash, the construction of terraces to prevent erosion and the adapting of land to its proper use has resulted in reconstructing many parts of northwest Louisiana.

For my part, I intend to vote and work for the return to this bill of the same amount of money voted for this work during the last session of Congress. I think the Congress makes a serious mistake in curtailing the work that keeps millions of our young men busy, out in the open, in a healthful, active life upon a most constructive work. In one sense, the Civilian Conservation Corps prevents more crime by giving these young men proper environment for their work than does the F. B. I. which investigates and places the fear of the law in the minds of those who otherwise would be violators. I intend, Mr. Speaker, to vote to increase the appropriation for this purpose to $287,000,000, this being an increase of $57,000,000.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. McEntee himself testified that $3,800,000 could be saved through putting on civilian employees instead of Army officers. They would not ask for that amount.

Mr. BROOKS. Your committee also said that by effecting certain economies it is thought that $6,000,000 more might be taken off, but it is still my opinion that a great many of the camps will be closed down. I think it is the gentleman's opinion that many of them will have to be closed down in order that this bill be workably used by the C. C. C.

Mr. ENGEL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. ENGEL. The records show that if this bill is passed without amendment, as originally submitted by the Budget, 28,000 employees will receive $49,400,000 in pay. If you cut off 2 employees per camp in the higher brackets, you have five or six million dollars' saving there.

Mr. BROOKS. A cut of 218 camps, as proposed by this bill, will mean the earnings of 436,000 American families will be greatly reduced and in many instances completely cut off. I want to see the number of camps continued as at the present time. When we reach 13,000,000 persons throughout the United States, when we actually bring funds to that many needy people throughout the United States, it is my opinion that the work is most worthy and should be continued.

Before I close, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I hold in my hand a great mass of telegrams from my congressional district in Louisiana. The ones that I think we are especially interested in are the ones that come from governmental bodies in the Fourth Congressional District, the mayors of towns, members of police juries and of conservation districts, and prominent leaders of northern Louisiana. At the proper time I expect to ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD following these remarks some of these telegrams and letters. I think they are worthy of consideration by this Congress as indicating the attitude of the public mind. [Applause.]

The letters and telegrams referred to follow:

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS,

We sincerely appreciate your help in retaining soil conservation and C. C. C. camp here. Work of Mansfield camp is not complete. Mansfield camp is youngest in this area; in actual acceptance of agreements this camp has more unfinished contracts (137 agreements accepted unfinished and with implied obligations to farmers) and more potential contracts than Keithville and Pleasant Hill camps combined. If economy move necessitates removal of one camp from this area, then let them move one of the other camps.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION,
Homer, La., March 14, 1940.

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is rumored that the Homer C. C. C. camp, situated in Claiborne Parish, might be one of those abandoned in connection with the President's recommendation of a reduction in camps.

Having been born and reared in this parish, we are acquainted with existing conditions.

First, Claiborne Parish is one of the largest hill parishes in the State, and also one of the most thickly populated hill parishes in the State.

Erosion has been taking place ever since the land was first brought under cultivation. The rate of erosion has been greater than in most of the adjoining parishes on account of the heavy population.

Homer seems to be the most logical place for a camp, having roads leading in all directions making all points of the parish accessible at all times of the year.

Soil-conservation districts were formed only a few months past and have just begun to function. Applications are being made at a greater rate than can be taken care of at present. A careful survey of the parish will substantiate the above statements.

The parishes of Lincoln and Union would be too far distant for any material good to be done for Claiborne Parish by the existing camps located in those parishes.

The parish of Claiborne has never received its pro rata share of protection justly due a parish of its size and population. The people of this parish are deeply interested in erosion control, realizing that unless the land is protected from erosion a greater part of the population must soon resort to other means of making a living.

We are enclosing a map of Claiborne Parish which shows the location of the present C. C. C. camp with relation to the road system of the parish.

We are also enclosing a clipping of an editorial and article which appeared in a parish paper under date of Wednesday, March 13, 1940.

In closing, may I ask that you use all available means in your power to help us in maintaining the camp at Homer.

Yours very truly,

CLAIBORNE PARISH AGRICULTURAL CONSERVATION COMMITTEE,
S. P. MEADOWS, Chairman.
L. M. GREEN, Member.
C. D. WORLEY, Member.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the debate this afternoon, particularly that which pertained to the National Youth Administration.

There has been some discussion and contention of political bias. I want to disclaim any political bias in this, but I will admit some personal bias. There is no need of my telling you people that I have been a school teacher, a college man. I have before coming to Congress been closely in contact with the N. Y. A., and I know whereof I speak. Ever since becoming a Member of this body I have consistently supported this program.

Right in the Well of this House in the spring of 1937, again in 1938 and in June 1939, I did what I could to get a suitable appropriation for the National Youth Administration. I recall last year that the Budget recommended $123,000,000. The committee came in with an estimate written in of $81,000,000. You will remember that we succeeded in offering one amendment after another until the bill was passed at $100,000,000. I recall distinctly that I was one of several who were to offer amendments in a certain order to increase the committee figure.

I deeply regret that the Budget, which a year ago recommended $123,000,000 annually, this year recommended only $85,000,000. I know how the President feels about this and many other matters. It must have been a feeling of great regret on the part of the Director of the Budget and the President himself that the recommendation was in that amount. Nothing but great pressure could have caused such a change.

I further regret that the committee has seen fit to write into the bill only the $85,000,000 recommended by the Budget. I know how regretfully the members of the subcommittee must feel about the matter, but that does not help when we need more than that amount of money. I understand that the total amount of this bill is several millions under the total amount of the Budget estimate for all its items. Therefore, an effort must be made to amend the bill with regard to N. Y. A., and make it more nearly adequate. Perhaps we may raise it so as to keep the bill still within the Budget limit for the total amount.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Very briefly.

Mr. HOUSTON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this bill was under the Budget estimate on the N. Y. A.?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. No; I did not say that. I understand that the total amount is under the Budget estimate, for all of the items.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is correct, approximately $12,000,000.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I thank the gentleman for the information. Such being the case, we could increase N. Y. A. $12,000,000 without exceeding the Budget estimate.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Briefly.

Mr. HOOK. I want to call attention to the hearings on page 615, where Mr. Williams said, "In my discussion with the President I asked for $125,000,000. This was revised by the Budget Bureau, and a budget of $85,000,000 was submitted to Congress."

Then on page 613 it is stated there that the estimate submitted by the Bureau of the Budget, 1941, National Youth Administration, is $100,000,000.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. That confirms my feeling that, if the President were not confronted with the national-debt limit set by Congress 25 years ago, the Budget estimate would at this time have been $123,000,000 or $125,000,000. What perplexing difficulties are involved in weighing the relative importance of so many necessary appropriations, knowing that to raise some means lowering others.

We all heard what was said here a moment ago about high salaries and the use of 400, 500, or 600 automobiles by the higher officials of N. Y. A. If you want to cut down on such, perhaps I am with you in that respect, for I want to put more money than $85,000,000 out yonder in the high schools and colleges where it will do the work. I want overhead minimized and the greatest possible proportion spent effectively.

I have said here in the Well of this House two or three times that I have in my office at this very minute, and have had ever since I have been here, young people who have graduated from college using the N. Y. A. to enable them to do so. Successful old folk are prone to hark back to the good old times when their poverty was a blessing. I can hardly believe that poverty ever was a blessing, but I have heard it said that it was. Well, the proverbial poor boy 60 or 80 years ago who went to the city and later became a captain of industry had an easy time when compared with some I have known the last dozen years.

A few days ago a young, red-headed, freckled-faced, stalwart from Arizona calling at my office said: "Dean, do you remember a time when you saved me from sleeping on the Bermuda?" He meant the Bermuda grass out in our warm valley.

I said, "I do remember one time when you and your roommate came to me late one evening and said, 'Our bed is gone.'"

"What happened?"

"Why," he said, "You know we were living in a little packing box not far from you on Van Ness Street. Well, the officers took our bed away."

These boys worked their way through school. I wager they lived on less than a dollar a week. They had such a small room that they had to have a double-deck bed, one bed above the other, in order to get inside the room with the bed there. They had rented that bed from a widow who had formerly run a rooming house, and the sheriff had come and taken the bed one day in their absence and they found themselves at nightfall with no bed. He joked and laughed about it a good deal. That young fellow now has a fine job, but he got his education and his A. B. degree working his own way through college with N. Y. A. aid while I was dean. I could multiply that case by a hundred, for I know that as many as 325 young people each year worked their way through school at the time I was dean of that teachers college, and they have become useful members of society now, self-respecting, and with heads up.

My secretary said to me just the other day, "Do you remember So-and-So?" one of my boys.

"Yes."

"Well, he graduated and is now married and has a good job."

"Yes; I understand."

Then my secretary said, "Do you notice in talking with him that he is more conservative than he used to be?"

The young man to whom he referred was a typical young college student, with plenty of brain power and with plenty of freedom in thinking. Now, after graduating from college with an A. B. degree and having a good job and married, he is a conservative young man. I cite this just to show that he has appreciated what the Government has done for him.

A 30-year war swept over Germany three centuries ago and left its mark upon that country for 200 years. A 10-year war has swept over our country, not a military invasion but a destruction just as devastating in this depression. These young people—and I have three of them, two sons and a daughter, who have grown to maturity during these 10 years and, thank God, they have got their schooling without any further help than dad and mother could supply—these are the young people of the so-called lost generation. Are they lost? Some of them are because we have been too niggardly in preparing for them. Youth is the time people must get the training they are going to need all through life. If it is not supplied to them at the proper time in youth, then they can never have it.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I yield gladly to my friend from the far Northwest.

Mr. LEAVY. I do not believe there is another man in this House who has shown himself in his career in the House to be a greater friend of youth than the gentleman from Arizona now addressing us. In the thousands and thousands of young people whose lives have been touched beneficially by this type of appropriation has the gentleman ever heard of a single instance where it has had a detrimental effect?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Not one, not one.

In view of the fact that the N. Y. A. is sometimes confused with another organization sounding very much like it in alphabetical name, there are some who would besmirch the N. Y. A., some who would make us believe that is filled with pinks and punks. I know nothing derogatory of the N. Y. A. nor any other youth organization. Let me tell the Members there is nothing pink or punk about the thousands and thousands of young people I know out West who are getting help through high school and college with this fund.

I am not here advocating high salaries and automobiles for the administrative higher-ups, and yet we should equip them sufficiently. In my observation they do not behave like lords of the earth. I have seen local N. Y. A. leaders apply themselves with almost missionary zeal to their devoted task. However, my chief concern is in supplying the means to take care of these young people in this devastating period of change through which we are passing. I ask you not to be niggardly in your appropriations for this most vital work. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself a minute to correct the RECORD. A statement was made this afternoon in reference to the travel expenses in the National Youth Administration. I direct attention to the record of the hearings on page 621 where there is obviously a misprint in the printing of the hearings. It says, "Estimate of the travel expenses, total, 52 officers on annual basis, $421,200." It very obviously should read, "Total, 52 offices on annual basis," because the preceding words indicate this is a misprint. So the conclusion reached by the gentleman from Minnesota—that the travel expenses amounted to about $27 a day for these people in the offices under N. Y. A.—is very clearly in error. He was misled into the statement due to the misprint which appeared in the record of the hearings.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration providing an appropriation for the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor for the year 1941 calls for a reduction of the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget from $6,185,000 to $5,105,000, or a reduction of $1,080,000. This is approximately a 20-percent reduction.

The committee, in its report on the bill, stated, and I quote:

> They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure, and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only serve in lending further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.

It is admitted by the proponents of the humanitarian Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 that it contains inequalities and perhaps ambiguities and should be amended accordingly. Carrying out this thought, the chairman of the committee introduced H. R. 5435, to amend the act. After full and exhaustive hearings before the Committee on Labor the bill was reported to the House. It was the committee's well-considered judgment that the bill, thus reported, met all reasonable requirements with respect to amending the act. It developed, however, that the amendments proposed in the bill did not meet with the approval of the adversaries of the act, many of whom were bent on either emasculating or repealing it. When H. R. 5435 was called up before the House it was promptly denied consideration by a majority teller vote.

The opponents of this humanitarian law, which has brought relief to the lowest of the low-paid workers of this country, have centered their attack on the agricultural provision which they consider to be the most vulnerable—with particular reference to the area of production. Defining the area of production in the farming sections of this country is very much the same as defining the area or boundary lines of every incorporated city or town in the United States. They must of necessity commence some place and end some place. The relative positions of a processing plant on the east side of a road and an identical place on the west side of a road—one within and the other without the area of production—is almost identical with that of the owner of property on the very edge but within a city limit and a property owner across the road who is outside of the city limit. The property owner who is just inside the city limit pays city taxes which, in many cases, are very high. His neighbor immediately across the road is not required to pay these taxes.

Defining such areas always has and always will be more or less an arbitrary matter. The same principle applies to every special public-utility district in every city or to every irrigation, bridge, and other tax-assessment district in the country.

I cannot believe the farmers of this country, who, in the final analysis, receive tremendous benefits from the higher standards of living this legislation brings, are seeking the destruction of this humanitarian wage and hour law either directly or indirectly. There are exceptions, of course, some farm areas having processing plants which are located on the wrong side of the road and outside of the area of production. It may well be that those representing these exceptions have raised such a loud clamor that a perspective of the great good of this legislation is lost.

But, Mr. Chairman, these are the selfish interests of this country who would hamstring, emasculate, and repeal a law which has brought some degree of comfort to the underprivileged in the lowest strata of industrial workers in the United States and they are striving to accomplish their purpose through this limited class of farmers in different sections of the country.

Farmers with rare exceptions have common cause with wage earners. The fair-minded farmers, who are in the overwhelming majority, are conscious of the fact that there are 33,800,000 men and women in nonagricultural employment in the United States. They also know—and I refer to the hearings before the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, 1941—that since 1932 Congress has appropriated in excess of $6,000,000,000 for farm relief in one form or another. Every intelligent farmer is appreciative of the proportionate amount the nearly 34,000,000 nonagricultural workers of this country have contributed to this enormous sum without a murmur. The farmers also realize that the nonagricultural workers and their families are by far the largest group of consumers of products of the farm and that the amount of their products consumed is measured entirely by wage earners' purchasing power.

Mr. Chairman, these few adversaries of the humane wage and hour law have been working overtime resorting to all kinds of propaganda to poison the minds of unsuspecting people by stressing its inequalities and so-called ambiguities. Those who would emasculate and repeal the law would throw the underpaid workers back into the pool of despondency, and they have been totally blind to the graver inequalities that actually existed for years prior to the enactment of this law. Before its enactment, for example, 45,000 women engaged in textile and other light industries, located between the District of Columbia and thc Hudson River, were receiving $5 and $6 a week and in many cases worked 9 and 10 hours a day. Textile workers in the State of Mississippi received from $2.50 to $7.50 a week. In the city of Atlanta, Ga., prior to the enactment of this law, there were two textile industries. The larger of the two paid its employees around $15 a week; its competitor paid its employees approximately one-half of that sum, thereby forcing its underpaid employees to receive contributions from the local relief authorities. I am informed that the owners of the industry who were paying the higher rate contributed a substantial sum—I believe $1,500—to the local relief fund, thereby contributing to the support of the employees of a cutthroat competitor who was paying starvation wages. Still there are those who complain of the inequalities under the law. These cases could be multiplied hundreds and hundreds of times, yet there are still those narrow-visioned or selfish individuals who complain of the inequalities under this law. The wage and hour law, which has eliminated this sort of cutthroat competition has been welcomed by every fair-minded employer, and I am pleased to state there are many thousands of such fair-minded employers in this country.

Before the enactment of this law, many unscrupulous employers of labor who paid starvation wages and, as a result, resorted to cutthroat competition, actually forced honest and conscientious employers of labor who believe in the just policy of live and let live to the alternative of meeting their terms or going out of business. These employers with high ideals who craved this act are unalterably opposed to handicapping it by lack of adequate enforcement due to an insufficient appropriation to properly administer the law. They make the reasonable request that the plants of their unscrupulous competitors who are now flagrantly violating the law be given proper inspection and policing. Such law-abiding citizens who welcomed this act are entitled to this protection. That they are again subject to cutthroat competition by violators of the law is a proven fact, as court records will show.

I cite just a few of these cases of violation of the law for they emphasize the need of an adequate appropriation:

There were 380,000 people engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for commerce earning less than 25 cents an hour when the Fair Labor Standards Act went into effect on October 24, 1938. That means 380,000 working 40 hours per week for less than $10 a week.

This figure does not include an additional 200,000 industrial home workers, the exploitation of whom is one of the blackest spots in the economic life of America. Only a few weeks ago a group of knitwear manufacturers signed a consent decree with the Wage and Hour Division, agreeing to make restitution of wages estimated at $250,000 to 10,000 of these home workers, mostly in rural districts of the East and South.

In the Federal court of Brooklyn, N. Y., a manufacturer of shade pulls and pot holders pleaded guilty to paying his home workers as low as 4 cents an hour. In court he was fined $1,500 and given a suspended fine of $6,000 on condition that he make restitution of $4,500 to these employees. The sums that each of these poor workers drew in restitution was more than equivalent to all the pitiable wages paid them for the full first year of the operation of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

In the case of a manufacturer of similar products, also in Brooklyn, who defied the Wage and Hour Division, the case went to trial before a jury in Federal court. Before the Government had completed its case the defendants withdrew their plea of not guilty and are now awaiting sentence.

Following an investigation by the Wage and Hour Division, a Chicago hairpin manufacturing company agreed to pay $110,000 in restitution to more than 300 families whose children had worked long hours, when they should have been at play, mounting hairpins on cards. At the same time the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor obtained a permanent injunction restraining this company from such practices in the future.

In the case of one of the largest glove manufacturers in the country, three of its officials were found guilty in a 19-count indictment of illegally withholding from 600 girl workers more than $10,000 in wages.

The court imposed fines totaling $7,500 against the company and its officials, and ordered them to make restitution to these girl workers within 90 days.

In Georgia a county relief investigator reported to the Wage and Hour Division that there was an employer, a runaway shop from New York, who paid his 100 workers such low wages—from $4 to $8 per week—that every family who was represented on its pay roll was on county relief.

Coming closer to Washington, over in Baltimore a few weeks ago in the Federal court, Judge W. Calvert Chestnut had before him two brothers who manufacture men's clothes. They had been indicted on charges of paying 175 women coat makers 10 cents an hour and less. There was one woman, a widow with three small children to support, who lived in a basement, who worked long hours and who still could not earn enough to keep her family from the verge of starvation. This partnership of brothers not only failed to pay them the minimum wage set up in the Fair Labor Standards Act but pleaded guilty to the charges that they had falsified their records in an effort to make it appear that the women were earning 25 cents an hour. In imposing sentence Judge Chestnut said:

> Falsification of records is the most reprehensible of offenses under the Fair Labor Standards Act. These records are the chief defense of the employees from being cheated of their wages. Destroying the records is dishonest, corrupt, and it indicates conscious guilt.

He fined each of the defendants $1,500, suspended an additional $2,500 fine against each, and placed them on probation for 2 years.

Early in 1938 a pecan-shelling company in San Antonio, Tex., which concededly handles a major portion of the shelled pecans which go into the commerce of the United States, applied to the Wage and Hour Division to employ between 2,500 and 3,000 learners at a rate of 15 cents an hour.

In the hearings held on this application it was shown that this company, which made a net profit of $500,000 in 2 years, paid wages as low as $3 and $4 per week, which was supplemented by the employment of laborers 10-, 12-, and 15-year-old children.

Mr. Chairman, the new administration of this act—and they have a new administration—should be encouraged and the appropriation recommended by the Bureau of the Budget should be approved by this House. The law should be given a fair chance. The present Administrator should be given a chance to demonstrate what this law means to the underprivileged of this country. I repeat, there are inequalities in the law. The new Administrator should bring to Congress a number of amendments that will meet with the approval of the majority of the membership of the House. These should be recommendations that will correct the inequalities in the law.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELCH. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman stated that the Administrator in due time will probably bring in proposed revisions of the law. In view of the fact that we are giving the Wage-Hour Division $1,646,000 more than it had during the present year, does not the gentleman feel it would be well to wait until the new Administrator has had 6 months to see what he can do?

Mr. WELCH. I do not. The new Administrator, with his limited force, cannot adequately check up on violators such as I referred to, and there are hundreds more. He cannot do that unless we give him sufficient funds.

Mr. HOUSTON. Could he look after all these violators?

Mr. WELCH. And it is not an excuse that the people of this country will readily accept when they realize the attempt that has been made to handicap this humanitarian law which has brought a little sunshine to the poorest of our wage-earning class.

Mr. HOUSTON. I agree with the gentleman, so far as the law is concerned.

Mr. WELCH. Then give the law a chance.

Mr. HOUSTON. We are giving it a chance.

Mr. WELCH. Please do not hamstring it. The House of Representatives has the opportunity now to act justly, honestly, and for the greatest good of both agriculture and labor.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS].

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, those of us who represent agricultural districts and who realize the difficulties faced by agriculture and have the interest of the American farmer at heart, will again face a grave responsibility sometime this week when the agriculture appropriation bill is brought back to the House for action on Senate amendments through the conference report. It is known to all here that the House made no provision for parity payments to the American former when this year's appropriation bill was first before the House some days ago. The Senate on Friday restored the $212,000,000 to provide parity payments for the American farmer, and I want here and now to call on the vigilance and fighting spirit of every Member of the House who realizes the plight of agriculture, to the end that this provision for parity payments be retained in the bill.

When you take into consideration the battles our farmers have faced through the years, they are an extremely reasonable class. If economy we must have and should have, and there is much merit in the contention that many of the expenses of the Government should be cut down, the farmers, I am convinced, are willing to take their share of the cut. We have a Budget of about $9,000,000,000, but according to my recollection the appropriation that first passed the House and was sent to the Senate provided only $640,000,000 to cover every phase of agriculture. Now, 31 percent of all our people live on the farm. Probably in addition to this 10 or 15 percent of our people win their livelihood directly from the farm whether they live there or not. So we have here at least 40 percent of our population directly dependent on agriculture for support; yet, with all the money being spent for the upkeep of the Government, with all the benefits going out to different groups of our people and business, the agricultural group, the very largest group and the backbone of the Nation, receives from the House bill benefits amounting to only 7 or 8 percent of the Budget. This is unfair, it is unjust, and to balance the scales more equitably the $212,000,000 for parity payments must be retained in the bill.

Gentlemen of the House, why is it that we have had such a fight on parity payments items in the House when the Senate had no trouble in placing the provision in the bill? Is it because representation in the House is based on population, which results in the representatives from the city areas being in the great majority here? Is it because the city representative here does not feel that benefits to farmers benefit the city people as well, and that if the farmer prospers, his prosperity flows on to the city? I hesitate to accuse you gentlemen from the city with being so shortsighted. The history of this country since Yorktown reveals that the manufacturing industry in the city, the store in the city, the salaried employee in the city, the laborer in the city, every one of them, have prospered in the same measure that agriculture has prospered, and that when the agricultural bloc of our population is driven against the wall, the repercussion is felt all the way up the line from the farm to the village, to the town, to the city, everywhere. Gentlemen, when you vote for parity payments for farmers you vote to help your own people in the city. When from 30 to 40 percent of our people are ground to the wall, when they have no hope left, their purchasing power dies with their hope, they cannot consume, and the manufacturer and the storekeeper in your city will suffer because the market for the products of his machine and factory has received a death blow too.

Now what is parity for the farmer? I have found in correspondence with some of my constituents that parity is not always clearly understood. Some Members of the House even seem by their utterances here to be slightly confused as to the meaning of the term. I think the best definition I have seen was set forth in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as follows:

> Parity as applied to prices for any agricultural commodity shall be that price for the commodity which will give to the commodity a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of such commodity in the base period. The base period, except for tobacco, is the period of August 1909 to July 1914.
> Parity as applied to income for agriculture shall be that per capita net income of individuals on farms from farming operations that bears to the per capita net income of individuals not on farms the same relation as prevails during the period from August 1909 to July 1914.

Or, stated another way by an expert on the subject:

> Parity income for agriculture is that net income from farming operations per person living on farms which bears the same relation to the income per person not living on farms as prevailed in the 5 years before the World War. Or, to state it another way, parity income for agriculture is the same share of the total per capita income available for living that agriculture received in the 1909–14 period. The farm income available for living includes cash received from the sale of farm commodities, plus the estimated value of products consumed on the farm, minus the principal business operating expenses of the farmer. Nonfarm income available for living is the comparable income received by the individuals making up the nonfarm population.

Corn, wheat, cotton, rice, and tobacco are the farm commodities to which parity payments would apply. Eighty percent of our farmers are engaged in raising at least one of these five crops. On February 15, 1940, the farm price of corn was 54.7 cents, and parity price was 82.2 cents; wheat farm price was 84.1 cents, with parity price 113.2 cents; rice farm price was 68.7 cents, with parity price 104.1 cents; tobacco farm price was 13.6 cents, with parity price 14.5 cents; and cotton farm price was 9.97 cents, with parity at 15.87 cents. It will be seen, therefore, that tobacco was the only commodity bringing above 75 percent of parity. It is intended that this appropriation will pay the cotton farmer from 1½ to 2 cents per pound, which, it is estimated, will raise the total price he receives on his product to 75 percent of parity.

Now, down my way, in my section of the great State of South Carolina, the farmers are mainly interested in parity payments as they may effect the cotton farmer. For years cotton has been our main money crop; I might say our only money crop, though we are getting away from that condition now, thanks to what this Democratic administration has done to promote diversification of crops as well as soil conservation. And let me say to you Representatives of farmers from other sections of the country where no cotton is planted that by helping the cotton farmer you are helping yourselves, because you are not forcing him into another field of competition with you. I say to you that if South Carolina farmers cannot make a living growing cotton, the inevitable result will be that they will raise for market other farm commodities instead of cotton, which will be thrown on the open markets of this country in competition with the commodities which you now raise for market exclusively. We can grow at a profit many farm products when adequate marketing and shipping facilities are provided. If cotton goes, we will be forced to raise corn, peas, oats, potatoes, and similar products not only, as now, for home consumption but to be thrown on the competitive market with yours. In years gone by, South Carolina raised indigo as its principal crop; when the prices obtained for indigo ceased to provide a livelihood for our farming people, they quit indigo and began to raise rice; and when it was found that rice could not be raised profitably, on account of severe competition, our coastal country quit rice and began to raise cotton. Now it looks like we are going to have to quit cotton, because we cannot raise it under present conditions and live. At the same time we cannot quit raising it overnight and live either.

Mr. Speaker, for over a century the farmer has been waging a brave but uneven fight for life, liberty, and the right to pursue happiness. If perchance, in spite of the winds that blew, the rains that fell, and the droughts that came, his fields produced a fair crop, inevitably, on account of forces beyond his control, he did not receive fair prices for products wrung from the soil by the sweat of his brow. If prices for his produce went down, the prices of the things he had to buy did not go down in proportion. If prices for his crop perchance went up a little, the prices of the things he had to buy went still further up and far out of proportion. I have noticed in some of the newspapers, particularly of the Northeast, that it is being said that the farmer should not expect to have parity of income or fair exchange value for his products on any such basis as prevailed before the World War or during the base period that I mentioned. In reply, allow me to approach the subject a little more directly and plainly, so that anyone may understand. I am going to insert in the RECORD quotations of prices from the Sears, Roebuck catalogue, one of 1913 and one of 1940.

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace has called our attention to certain items in this price schedule. Take work shirts for example. Work shirts could be ordered from the 1913 catalog for an average price of 57 cents. The average price in the 1940 catalog is 73 cents, an increase of 28 percent. At January 15 prices in 1913 it took 4.7 pounds of cotton to buy a work shirt. The cost now is the equivalent of 7.2 pounds of cotton, based on January 15 prices, or 53 percent more than in 1913. The cost of bib overalls has increased 39 percent in dollars and cents. In terms of cotton, the cost has increased from 5.8 pounds to 9.6 pounds, or 66 percent.

Common nails have not changed much, if any, since 1913, but the price has gone up 74 percent. At January 15 prices for hogs in 1913 it took 31 pounds of hogs to buy 100 pounds of eightpenny nails. But at January 15 prices in 1940, it took 70 pounds of hogs to buy 100 pounds of eightpenny nails, an increase of 126 percent. The quality of an ordinary 4-pound ax probably is not better now that in 1913, but the price has almost doubled, rising from 96 cents to $1.89—an increase of 97 percent. The amount of wheat required in exchange for a 4-pound ax has increased from 1.2 bushels to 2.2 bushels, or almost double what it was 27 years ago.

Corn planters are essentially the same now as in 1913, but the price has gone up from $31.25 to $65.95—an increase of 111 percent. The important point for the corn producer is the amount of corn it takes to buy a corn planter. In 1913 it took 64 bushels of corn to buy a two-row check planter. Today it takes 124 bushels. Thus the real price to the corn producer is now double what it was in 1913. At January 15 prices this year it took 124 bushels of corn to buy a two-row corn planter.

In 1913 a long-handled round-point shovel could be purchased for 48 cents. The cheapest shovel of this type quoted in the 1940 catalog is for sale at 79 cents, an increase of 65 percent. Twenty-seven years ago a three-tine hay fork could be bought for 39 cents. A similar fork today costs 79 cents, or 103 percent more.

All of the articles referred to are essentially the same now as in 1913.

It has been said here that parity payments are nothing but a subsidy to agriculture and therefore unwise. I agree that the payments amount to a subsidy, and I assert that agriculture cannot prosper with the lopsided economic set-up in this country unless it is subsidized. Why not subsidize the cotton farmer, when the manufacturer of the cloth made from the farmer's cotton is subsidized through the tariff? Why not subsidize the cotton farmer when the manufacturer of the ax, the shovel, the hoe, the plow, the rake, and the nails which he buys at exorbitant prices are, themselves, subsidized through the tariff? Gentlemen, the tariff placed this intolerable burden on the shoulders of the American farmer—the tariff pressed this crown of thorns against his brow. For a hundred years or more the tariff has been in operation in this country in one form or another. The tariff has made one part of our economic body strong but, at the same time, it has caused the right arm of this body, namely agriculture, to wither away. There are two remedies for this condition—one, the tariff must either be cut down to a plane with agriculture; or, two, agriculture must be subsidized up to a point where it will be equally protected with industry. We who are in favor of this appropriation are subscribing to the philosophy of Mahomet:

If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet will go to the mountain.

Gentlemen of the Republican side of this House, some of you helped to pass the iniquitous Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of a few years ago. Some of you still cling to the theory that the salvation of this country rests only in huge subsidies paid through the tariff to big business and manufacturers of this country and that there is no justice in parity payments for the farmer. I suggest that you study a little further into the philosophy of the patron saint of the Republican Party tariff policy and you will find that, even though Alexander Hamilton was the father of the high-tariff system in this country, he realized and taught that there could be no permanent prosperity with a high-tariff system unless a subsidy or bounty is paid to agriculture to offset it.

I quote Hamilton on this subject:

Bounties are sometimes not only the best but the only proper expedient for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. * * *

The true way to conciliate these two interests is to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material, the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty by way of bounty, either upon the production of the material itself or upon its manufacture at home, or upon both. In this disposition of the thing the manufacturer commences his enterprise under every advantage which is attainable, as to quantity of price of the raw material, and the farmer, if the bounty is immediately to him, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with the foreign material.

You gentlemen have followed Hamilton in his high-tariff doctrine. You have quoted him year in and year out as authority for the wisdom of your actions heretofore, but never, never, do we hear a word out of you as to what Hamilton said must be done for agriculture if the tariff is to be a blessing to all of our people.

Far be it from me to criticize this Democratic administration for what it has done for the farmer. I remember 1931 and 1932 when the cash income of the farmers dropped to $4,358,000,000 and in 1939 it rose again to almost $10,000,000,000. No President in the history of the country has shown the interest in the farmer nor has proposed as much legislation for the benefit of the farmer as President Roosevelt has. Never before in any Congress has so much legislation been passed in an effort to help the farmer. Many of his problems have been solved by this Congress. He has been taught the value of woodlands and trees; he has been taught the benefits of diversification; he has been shown that under a one-crop system he cannot prosper; he has been instructed in the way to fight insects and plant diseases; he has been given the benefits of his country's credit system; he has been given lower interest rates; and, best of all, he has been taught how to conserve the soil upon which he lives and which he loves so well. We have the Soil Conservation Act, which is a success. We have the Loan Act. We have set up the Farm Credit Administration. We have the Agricultural Adjustment Act. We have the Tenant Purchase Act, which gives to every tenant the chance and the hope that sooner or later he may be master of his own land and king in his own castle. The people of this country are coming to realize that love of the good earth, love of the sweet, pungent odor that comes from the fresh-plowed dirt, love of the sound of breezes whispering through the trees above the soil a man calls his own—that love of these things brings with them good citizenship, the backbone of any nation.

In these trying times, with war all around, no one knows what sacrifices may be required of American citizenship in the years ahead; but, come what may, the United States will be ready then if we remember now that men do not give their lives cheerfully for a boarding house; they work, fight, and die cheerfully only for their homes, their farms, and for governments that make these blessings possible.

No one who has not experienced the pathos of a farmer's fight to own a farm, or to hold the one he already owns, can fully sympathize with his problems; only those who have carried such a burden can know the weight crushing the shoulders of those who still do. Faced with the tariff, an unknown market, an uncertain price, he plants his seed in the spring with a prayer; he faces the long summer and plows ahead. If the floods, and the winds, and the droughts, and the insects pass him by for a season, still he finds himself at the mercy and in the hands of those who have trafficked on his miseries for centuries.

A few weeks ago Edwin Markham, a great poet, died, but he left us lines that will never die:

THE MAN WITH THE HOE

Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans
Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
The emptiness of ages in his face
And on his back the burden of the world.

[Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GIBBS].

Mr. GIBBS. Mr. Chairman, since I was about 16 years old I have been looking for the United States Government, as well as the State of Georgia, in which I live, to go into bankruptcy. In other words, as far back as I can remember I have heard the hue and cry that if the Federal Government kept spending as it had and was spending, the Government was headed toward bankruptcy. I am now 51 years of age and I have not seen it yet. The point I make is we will not go into bankruptcy so long as we provide employment for the youth of our Nation. I want to add my endorsement to the N. Y. A. plan.

Mr. Chairman, I got up to speak principally on the C. C. C.

Upon the creation of the Civilian Conservation Corps in the spring of 1933, 5 years prior to my election to the House of Representatives, I maintained close observation of the activities of that organization because of its direct effect upon Georgia and Georgians.

The initial plans, aims, and purposes of the Civilian Conservation Corps were immediately recognized as principal needs of the pine forests and agricultural sections of my native Georgia.

Being a lifelong resident of a State with enormous and invaluable natural resources, having among its industries those which are products of the soil, it is not difficult to understand why the people of my State welcomed such a program as inaugurated by the Civilian Conservation Corps.

In that category of natural resources I place the enormous naval stores, lumber, and recently introduced paper-pulp industry, in addition to agricultural enterprises, all of which depend upon the richness of the good earth for success.

With the advent of the Civilian Conservation Corps there came into Georgia at a most crucial time a medium for the preservation of all those industries, upon which depends the livelihood of thousands of my fellow Georgians. Long had been realized the necessity and imperativeness of drainage, soil conservation, soil-erosion control, forest preservation, and the perpetuation of those God-given things from which Georgians derive their greatest source of revenue.

Before the coming of the Civilian Conservation Corps feeble and unsuccessful efforts, augmented by futile educational programs, had been launched in hopes of saving depletion of Georgia's vast timber and naval-stores resources. Woods burning, destroying millions of future pines, was a general practice, reforestation was not popularly accepted, and Georgia's vast pine forests were in a state of rapid depletion.

But only 7 years ago there came into being the Civilian Conservation Corps to present solutions to those problems which had confronted Georgians for generations and for the correction of destructive practices which were proving disastrous to the State's forest resources.

Being from a State which produced 800,000,000 board feet of lumber in 1935 and representing a district which produces 25 percent of the entire output of naval stores in the United States, and being a native of a section which produced 634,520 barrels of turpentine in 1937, it can readily be seen why I, like other Georgians, welcomed the coming of the Civilian Conservation Corps, designed specifically for the preservation and perpetuation of those resources which mean so much to the future of Georgia.

But aside from rendering my people and State such a magnificent and invaluable service, I have come to the realization that the Civilian Conservation Corps not only is an organization for the preservation of our resources for generations to come, but is a builder and rebuilder of previously wasted American youth.

Bringing into its fold a total of 2,600,000 American youths the Civilian Conservation Corps has developed those youths from needy and unfortunate circumstances into self-supporting, independent members of society, improving the employability and physical condition of young men.

Those who have seen service in the Civilian Conservation Corps have learned the responsibility of providing for dependents, have become better American citizens, hold a greater respect for law, and have developed into useful Americans instead of sinking into a state of human derelicts and public charges.

As a prosecuting attorney for a period of 16 years, I am in thorough accord with the opinion of J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, who declared that the Civilian Conservation Corps has been one of the most important, if not the most important, factor in the reduction of crime among the youth of this Nation.

The Civilian Conservation Corps has taken off the roads and the railroad freight trains young boys who might have drifted into underworld activities and has delivered them into useful citizenship. It cannot be denied that this work has had a most welcome effect upon law enforcement and that is the observation of all law-enforcement officers throughout the United States.

However, returning to the program of the Civilian Conservation Corps, I am strongly favorable toward its continuation on the principles upon which it was inaugurated nearly 7 years ago. There probably is no other Federal agency which is more highly appreciated by the entire people of this country than the Civilian Conservation Corps.

Speaking for the people who I represent in the Congress, and I am certain that I express the sentiments of my entire Georgia, the Civilian Conservation Corps has been an indispensable unit in the future welfare and development of my State.

That which preserves our natural resources, that which provides solutions to problems of distressed people, and that which builds men into fine American citizenship should not ever be stricken from the activities of our Federal Government. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD], a member of the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish at this time to discuss the Federal tax collections under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act and grants to States for administration of unemployment compensation under Title III of the Social Security Act.

Under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act, sections 1600–1611 of the Internal Revenue Code, a Federal tax of 3 percent of pay rolls is levied upon employers of eight or more in industry and commerce. Against this tax each employer in a State with an unemployment-compensation law approved by the Social Security Board may credit his contributions under such State law up to a maximum of 90 percent of the Federal tax. In general, this results in an employer paying 2.7 percent to a State unemployment compensation fund and 0.3 percent to the Federal Government, making a total of 3 percent. In States where merit rating or individual employer experience rating exists, as in Wisconsin, the employer pays whatever rate is applicable to him under the State law and continues to pay three-tenths of 1 percent to the Federal Government.

The three-tenths of 1 percent paid to the Federal Government is collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department and covered into the general fund of the Treasury like any other general tax. It is not earmarked by law in any way.

Under title III of the Social Security Act the Social Security Board makes grants for the purpose of assisting the States in the administration of their State unemployment compensation laws. By June 30, 1940, the Federal grants, including expenses of the Social Security Board, for this purpose for the period since January 1, 1936, will have totaled $177,000,000. The net Federal revenues from the three-tenths of 1 percent pay-roll tax, after deduction of various tax refunds, will have totaled approximately $297,000,000, or nearly $120,000,000 more than has been expended for grants to the States for administration of their unemployment compensation laws and for the administration of the Social Security Board's activities with respect to unemployment compensation. The exact amount would have to be determined after June 30, 1940, on the basis of the income and expenditures shown on the Treasury's books.

The main reason for this excess is due to the fact that while it became effective January 1, 1936, it was not until July 1, 1939, that all of the States were paying unemployment compensation benefits. Of course, during the period when benefits were not paid administrative costs were low, since the main task of the State's administrative agencies was only to collect contributions. However, when benefit payments began it was necessary to greatly extend the employment service and provide for local facilities for handling claims for benefits. It is reasonable to assume that if all of the States had begun benefit payments on January 1, 1936, when contribution collections began, the Federal grants for necessary administrative expenses would have been considerably greater. During the first few months of benefit payments the State administrative costs were running about 12 percent of the State tax collections. This cost has now been brought down to about 7½ percent. To the extent that State administrative costs stay below 10 percent of State collections they will, of course, also be less than the 10 percent of the 3-percent pay-roll tax received by the Federal Government.

While the operating costs of the State systems are now well below 10 percent, a period of greater unemployment among insured workers would decrease contributions and increase the administrative costs of claims work, which would probably result in administrative cost in excess of 10 percent.

Only future experience can adequately indicate the amounts necessary for this purpose. The extension and operation of individual employer experience rating in all States will increase administrative cost. Increased expansion of the job placement activities of the local public employment offices may also require more time and money in the future. Offsetting such increases are the economies being made by the more efficient planning of operations as the States gain the necessary experience. It may be mentioned in passing that during the early years of the British system of unemployment compensation administrative costs were regularly well above 10 percent of the collections. To be sure, the initial coverage was small but these costs ranged from 26 percent in 1913 down to 10.5 percent in 1922–23, and were less than 10 percent for only 3 years up to 1932. At this point I would like to call the attention of the House to page 30 of the record in which you find the following comments:

> The ratio of administrative cost to benefits paid varies widely in the different States. Too widely in the opinion of the committee. The Board should give this matter immediate consideration with a view of reducing the variables that enter into the picture. For instance, in Montana the administrative cost was 4.5 percent, in Mississippi it was 17.6 percent. There is real opportunity here for stabilization of administrative costs with resultant economies, and the committee will expect efforts to be made in this direction.

This agency had an appropriation of approximately $368,000,000 in 1940. Their Budget proposal was approximately $432,000,000. After extensive hearings and extremely careful consideration, the committee recommends in this bill $421,200,000. This is a saving of approximately $10,630,000 under the 1941 estimates. This saving was made possible by deducting approximately $10,000,000 from the grants to States for old-age assistance. In addition, $330,000 was deducted from the item of salaries and expenses of the Social Security Board and $300,000 from the Unemployment Compensation Administration, and your committee feels that the recommendation it has made in this bill and which was voted on by the members of the Appropriation Committee as a whole should be sustained by the Members of the House, because we gave it our most intense and serious consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, there are several matters in this bill in which I am very much interested and about which I wish to talk in the few minutes which I have at my disposal. The first is the wage and hour appropriation.

The Appropriations Committee proposes to reduce the appropriation recommended by the President for the Wage and Hour Division by $1,346,400—20 percent of the total amount recommended by the President, which was $7,486,000. This would reduce the recommended appropriation for salaries by $1,035,000.

This would be a crippling reduction. The Division is now operating on the basis of annual expenditures of $7,716,000. Moreover, when the Wage and Hour Division appeared before the Appropriations Subcommittee of the House in July 1939 to ask for additional sums in the deficiency bill the statement was made, and apparently was understood, as appears in the record, from both sides, that the rate of expenditure at the beginning of the fiscal year 1941, by reason of appropriations then made, would be annually $7,716,000; that is, that the money which was available for the fiscal year 1940, through the regular and deficiency appropriations, would be spent in increasing amounts each month, so that in the final month of that year and the first month of the fiscal year 1941 the annual rate of expenditure would be $7,716,000. Consequently the appropriation recommended by the President is $230,000 less than the annual rate that was contemplated last July.

The proposed reduction in the amount recommended by the President would mean a reduction in the inspection force of 350 men—more than a third of the total inspection staff contemplated. In addition, a very substantial number of attorneys in Washington and in the field must be discharged or furloughed without pay.

The results of such reductions on inspection are obvious. With the enforcement staff so reduced it will be simply impossible for the Division to achieve adequate enforcement. Inadequate enforcement means nonuniform discriminatory enforcement. Employers who have been voluntarily complying with the labor standards prescribed by the act will be subjected to price competition by chiselers whom the Division will be powerless to bring to book. As a result of this situation noncompliance could be expected to spread like fire or pestilence. It would become too unprofitable to comply and too easy to violate. For that reason I am opposed to the cut proposed by the committee.

With reference to the National Youth Administration, there are between four and six million young men and young women who are out of school and looking for jobs but unable to find them. We are not going to get anywhere by blaming these young people because they have been unable to find work because there simply are not enough jobs to go around.

Leaders of industry, education, and labor have recognized the fact that our youth are caught in a desperate situation with no place to turn. In October 1939 the American Youth Commission, a non-Government and nonpartisan organization headed by such men as Owen D. Young, of General Electric; Henry I. Harriman, past president of the United States Chamber of Commerce; and Robert E. Wood, of Sears, Roebuck, recommended a program of public work for all young people unable to find jobs in private industry.

That program would have cost over one and one-half billion dollars a year. Certainly, if the leaders of big business are willing to come out and urge a program of that proportion for jobless youths, it is because a careful study has convinced them that our young people are faced with a serious situation—a plight much more desperate than we may realize.

Certainly, if the leaders of business, education, and labor come out with a billion-and-a-half-dollar youth program, we ought to be willing to go at least part way with them, and the best place to put the money is in the National Youth Administration.

An appropriation of $125,000,000 for the National Youth Administration would be a small amount to make available in the face of this obvious need, but it will do more good than any other money this Congress can appropriate.

The record of the National Youth Administration is ample proof that, dollar for dollar, the appropriation for this agency is the best investment we can make. Any way we look at it—from the standpoint of youth or from the standpoint of our own future security and welfare—the dollars we spend to fit our young men and young women to become useful members of society is a gilt-edged investment.

The National Youth Administration is fitting young men and young women for jobs in business and industry and is placing them in private employment just as fast as jobs open up. There is a turn-over on N. Y. A. work projects of between 9 and 10 percent a month, which means a turnover of more than 100 percent a year. Between one-third and one-half of the youths who leave N. Y. A. projects do so to take jobs in private industry. That is pretty good evidence that our youth are eager and ambitious and that the N. Y. A. is giving them the right start.

Through N. Y. A. jobs, youths who otherwise would grow up in idleness and despair are being taught sound habits of work and are getting the chance to acquire the basic experience they need to get private jobs.

This year the National Youth Administration, with an appropriation of $100,000,000, provides part-time work for about a half-million out-of-school youths. If you could see these young people before they go to work for N. Y. A. going from factory to factory and from farm to farm, most of them without a dime in their pockets, many of them hungry, on the verge of despair, you would know what it means to them to be unable to find a job. Then if you could see them on their N. Y. A. jobs, see how eagerly they go about their tasks, how eager they are to work and to learn, you would know what a whale of a difference a chance to work and a few dollars in wages make.

Every N. Y. A. project has been operated in cooperation with some local public agency. The schools, the playgrounds, the parks, and public buildings these young people have built are going to benefit all of the people in the community.

Hundreds of thousands of young men and young women have been tided over an emergency. Their labor has gone to enrich the entire Nation. Their skills have been conserved, they have learned how to work, and their morale has been preserved, and those are benefits which will accrue to the whole Nation, both in the present time and in the future.

It has cost the Nation about $268 a year for each out-of-school youth employed by the National Youth Administration. That is a low price to pay for human welfare.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak now briefly about the National Labor Relations Board. No one in this House is in any doubt about how I feel with regard to the present administration of the National Labor Relations Act. I believe the majority members of the Board, Mr. Madden and Mr. Smith, could well serve the interests of our country and of the present administration by promptly tendering their resignations, and I have so stated publicly a number of times. However, to cut the National Labor Relations Board appropriation, as the committee proposes to do on the ground that the number of incoming cases decreased from 10,430 during 1938 to 6,904 last year, and because during the current 6 months of the fiscal year the cases show a rate of about 6,000 a year, it seems to me is not logical. If this comparison stood alone as a reflection of decreased Board activity I would be eager to make proportional savings in administering the Labor Act.

The 10,000 cases coming to the Board in 1938 represented the flood of unfair labor practices, charges, and petitions for elections submitted by labor as soon as the act was declared constitutional. The Labor Board was not staffed to meet this emergency. It was forced to triple its staff overnight, and still found on its hands a heavy backlog of cases which, in addition to new incoming cases, has caused a 3-year struggle for the agency to clear its docket and give that speedy resolution of cases which in the labor field is peculiarly important. I am told that the Board is current as to its representation cases, that is, it only requires an average of 1 month to decide a case where the proper bargaining representation is in dispute. The difficulty lies with the unfair labor practices cases. These average well over 1,000 pages of testimony each and are much more difficult cases to adjudicate than they were in the earlier days of this act.

That the decreased numbers of incoming cases is a poor index of Board work to be done is shown by the fact that the number of cases pending actually stood at its highest point at the end of the last fiscal year. There were then more than 4,000 undecided cases on the Board's books. Awaiting review today are more than half a million pages of testimony which in themselves would represent nearly a year's work if no single new case were entered. Labor in fact is submitting new cases, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O., in about equal numbers, and while the total is less than in the peak year of 1938 there are still enough of them to keep the Board's staff working overtime.

In 5 years they have closed 22,000 cases, involving 4,000,000 workers. The simple fact is that an inundation of cases in 1937–38 swamped them and they have never quite been able to catch up.

It must also be noted that cases are becoming more complex. A dispute settled informally by one of its field agents requires infinitely less time and energy than one which goes to formal hearing and demands the services of trial attorneys, trial examiners, review attorneys, and final consideration by the Board. In 1937 the number of cases necessitating such formal handling jumped 50 percent over the preceding year. The life cycle of other agencies, such as the Federal Trade Commission, shows a tendency over the years toward conducting few but much more time-consuming cases. It would seem a strange thing to suggest this as a reason for depriving the agency of the means to do its work.

Insofar as reducing the Board's staff would deprive workers quick access to the Labor Act, it would be unwise in the public interest as well as in their interest. We established this act so that workers might have a channel for their complaints instead of nurturing them in secret or carrying them to the picket line.

Take $57,000 away from the Board's trial-examiner's section and you reduce their number by one-quarter. Already each trial examiner is handling 30 cases a year. That is less than 10 working days in which to sit upon a case and write a formal report. It is impracticable to reduce that time further. By making that one cut you would make it necessary for the Board to refuse to undertake 25 percent of its hearings. You leave 250 cases a year to be resolved by strikes instead of by law.

In conclusion I wish to point out that serious misunderstandings exist as to the function of the Board's division of economic research. It is proposed to wipe out this section entirely, as the supposition held by some Members that its principal duty is to pry into the financial standing of employers to the advantage of employees. The first duty of the section is to explore data to discover whether the Board, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, has the right to jurisdiction over an industry in which a labor dispute has arisen.

For its first 2 years the principal fight on the validity of the Labor Act centered on the contention that it could not apply to manufacturers. The research to contest that claim was done by this same economics section of the Board's staff, and so well done that the Supreme Court took judicial notice of the fact that these great social problems are not decided in a vacuum but must be considered in the light of the complex interrelations of modern industry. The carefully prepared studies of the Board's research division entered largely into the favorable decisions of the Supreme Court in the first five cases by which the act was first upheld on April 12, 1937, and have played a continuing part in supporting the jurisdiction of the act in contested fields. Briefs prepared by the research division have been cited by the Supreme Court and Circuit Courts of Appeals in cases where the Board itself was not involved.

The importance of the economic brief in aiding the courts is stressed in a recent article in the University of Chicago Law Review which cites 19 cases in which economic data was presented and then points out that the party resorting to such presentation won 16 of the cases while those who failed to develop economic factors won only 3 cases. Seven of the 16 successful suits were those of the Labor Board, using data prepared by its economic research section.

The work of the Labor Board is currently subjected to the most critical public analysis of any Government agency. There is no danger that you will not be apprised of what it does with its funds.

I do not question the sincerity of the members or the staff of the Labor Board, however, I hold no brief for them, but I believe it is a mistake to starve these agencies to death. If they are to be eliminated, let us do it directly. [Applause.]

I regret that the subcommittee has included in the bill a section denying the possibility of civil service to employees of the National Youth Administration. Since the House recently passed H. R. 960 it would seem to me that such a restriction should not remain in this measure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself enough time to make a statement which I believe it is important be made at this time.

I have no question as to the sincerity and honesty of purpose of my colleague from Georgia who has just spoken, but I feel that he is mistaken as to the facts with regard to the effect of these proposed reductions in Budget estimates upon the operations of the Wage and Hour Division. I wish to call the attention of the Members, not only for the benefit of those present, but for the benefit of those who may have the opportunity to examine the RECORD prior to our session tomorrow, to the statistics set out on pages 345 and 346 of the hearings, showing the total number of supervising inspectors, senior inspectors, and inspectors stationed at Wage and Hour Division regional and branch offices on February 1, 1940.

In connection with that information I shall state that I have before me the printed bill which was for consideration before the subcommittee and which contains certain information with regard to the number of field and departmental employees of the Wage-Hour Division during the fiscal years 1939, 1940, and 1941. It will be observed from these statistics that the total permanent field employees for the fiscal year 1940 were estimated at 896 when the officials of the Wage-Hour Division came before the Appropriations Committee in order to secure the appropriation of sufficient funds to carry on the work of their organization for the present fiscal year. It is also to be observed that the total number of permanent field employees estimated for in the 1941 Budget is 2,018, as against 896 for the present fiscal year.

It will also be observed that for the fiscal year 1940, according to the statistics which have been inserted in the hearings and to which I have made reference, the Wage-Hour Division had employed as of February 1 in its field inspection service only 334 inspectors of the three types to which I have made reference, although it would have been authorized to have employed 398 under its estimate as approved by Congress for the present fiscal year. The estimates for 1941, which have been reduced in what I consider to be a very reasonable way by the committee, contemplated the addition of a sufficient number of inspectors to raise the number to 661, or approximately double those which the Wage-Hour Division had in service on February 1, 1940.

So that not only will this proposed reduction, which is still so comparatively small in amount as to leave this division $1,644,000 more for the next fiscal year than it had for the present fiscal year, not result in the discharge of any portion of their field inspection force, but it will be sufficient to allow them to employ inspectors considerably larger in number than those that they had in their employment on February 1, 1940, and if they need additional inspectors for this year they are authorized, under the terms of the current appropriation bill, to increase the number from 334 to 398, as estimated for the present fiscal year.

I have not undertaken to discuss the departmental employment, but similar figures will be found in the record relating to that employment, and I think it is important for the House to know that not only will this reduction below the Budget estimates not have the result which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] and the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH], who preceded him, anticipate, but that it will provide for a considerably larger field force of inspectors than is now in the service or was in the service on February 1, 1940.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, my colleague knows that I would not question in any way the facts that he has before him there, but I am somewhat at a loss to understand the facts as related by my colleague, in view of the statement made to me last Thursday evening by the Director of this division, Colonel Fleming, in the presence of a member of the gentleman's subcommittee, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE], that if the committee's recommended appropriation went through it meant an actual dismissal of present employees, and it is upon that type of information that I have made the statement I made here this afternoon.

Mr. TARVER. I am sure that the gentleman was misled. It is possibly true that the Wage-Hour Administrator contemplates greatly enlarging the number of his force between now and July 1, so that, with the enlarged number that he may contemplate having July 1, it would be necessary to have a considerably larger appropriation in order to pay their salaries in full for the next fiscal year, but this evidence, which is in the hearings and which I trust my colleague will examine, shows that he only had on February 1 334 of these field inspectors, when he was authorized to have had 398 if he so desired, and that the appropriation which we propose for the next fiscal year will provide for the employment of largely more than the number which he now has in his employment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHEPPARD. At the same time they had ample money to place all the employees which the law permitted them to use. Is not that correct?

Mr. TARVER. Absolutely true. The estimates were based upon the number of employees which they anticipated they would need.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSPECK. May I say to my colleague that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] and myself were talking with Colonel Fleming about this matter, and the gentleman from South Carolina had stated to me previously that the recommended appropriation would not require the dismissal of any of the present employees. I asked Colonel Fleming about that in the presence of the gentleman from South Carolina, and he said that was a mistake—that it would require the dismissal of a considerable number of the existing employees.

Mr. TARVER. If the gentleman will examine the statement which I refer to in the RECORD he will find that it is the evidence of Colonel Fleming as given to this committee, and the evidence is as I have stated it, and it shows there is no prospect of the dismissal of any employees by reason of the reduction which is contemplated below the Budget estimates.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to know how an increase in the appropriation of $1,644,000 will entail the dismissal of any employees.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If they pay them out of that money, of course, they would have to dismiss some of them if they do not get the money, if they have them now.

Mr. TARVER. The point my colleague is making is that we are not only not taking the million dollars off so far as this year's appropriation is concerned, but we are proposing to add $1,644,000 to what they had this year, and therefore there is no possibility that I can see or that is disclosed by the RECORD, that this action, if approved by the House, will result in the decrease of the field force of the Wage-Hour Division.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Is it not true they had a deficiency appropriation of a very large amount which the gentleman is not taking into consideration?

Mr. TARVER. All of it is included in the figures I have quoted to the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman means he is adding $1,000,000 over and above what they had with the deficiency appropriation.

Mr. TARVER. With the deficiency appropriation; yes, indeed.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Has the committee taken into consideration the additional work which has been entailed by the recent decisions, and I am referring particularly to the decision in the shoe industry, which requires quite a number of inspectors to enforce?

Mr. TARVER. Is the gentleman talking about the appropriation for the Wage-Hour Division or the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The Wages and Hours Division.

Mr. TARVER. The Committee took into consideration all pertinent facts as disclosed by the rather extensive hearings which were held by the Committee, and without any intention to hamper the work of the Wages and Hours Division in any way whatever, decided that the amount which we have recommended to the Congress would very reasonably provide for all of their activities during the next fiscal year.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP].

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, one of the oldest and most widely discussed subjects is youth. In past years we thought mainly of the romance of youth rather than an actual youth problem. We thought in terms of the pleasures only young people enjoy; we delighted in comparing the younger generation to our own; we viewed with alarm new trends and attitudes prevailing among the youth group; we gave little thought of the problem of jobs; or, if we did, we thought mainly of the romance attached to preparing for and entering adult life.

This was a grand and glorious period in our history. Little did we realize how fortunate we were in having a western frontier which absorbed young people who were unable to find opportunity at home. We did not know that we would later face a period when the youth problem would become painfully realistic. We were not prepared to face reality—not even at a time when 4,000,000 young people were known to be out of school, unemployed, and hopelessly looking for jobs.

We did find a partial solution to the problem in the establishment of the Civilian Conservation Corps and the National Youth Administration. These agencies have made a powerful impact on American life; they have conserved youth resources; they have restored hope, courage, ambition to youth; they have provided educational opportunity and work experience; and at the same time their work has added to our national wealth. I take great pride in pointing to the work of these agencies as examples of effective action to alleviate a grave youth problem.

But I am not one who feels that present measures are adequate. We are still unwilling to face reality and make adequate provision for youth. The most glaring evidence of this is the proposed reduction of the National Youth Administration appropriation from $100,000,000 to $85,000,000.

This agency has been not only a most needed one, but one which has met with popular approval in every section of the Nation. The N. Y. A. student-work program, which enables needy young people to continue their education, has been accepted as a part of the local education program. It has enabled hundreds of thousands of youths to take advantage of established educational facilities. Youth Administration projects for out-of-school youth have preserved the morale, the skill, the energy, and prepared for regular employment hundreds of thousands of unemployed, nonschool, young people.

What is the threat of unemployment to American youth? Four millions of enterprising and ambitious young people are faced with an appalling fact—that there are not enough jobs, temporary or permanent, to give them the foundation to take up a normal life. We talk about economy without recognizing what economy means to thousands of young people who have not a chance to work. The National Youth Administration received $100,000,000 from the Congress for this year. Are we going to permit any less to be appropriated to this worthy agency for the continuance of its programs of education and employment of needy youth?

A decrease of $15,000,000 will reduce by 123,000 the average employment of youth by the National Youth Administration. The immediate results of this reduction will be that the education of over 75,000 will be stopped and another 48,000 will be forced to accept idleness as a vocational pursuit. For the amazingly low per capita cost of less than $135 a year, 746,268 young men and women are kept in school, given counseling and legitimate work experience.

Every effort is made by the N. Y. A. officials to get these young people off the part-time N. Y. A. job into private employment. Turn-over from the work projects is between 90 percent and 100 percent in the course of a year. And over 31 percent who leave the projects are able to get private jobs, chiefly because they have had some sound work experience and some proper guidance from people who are interested in their welfare. The 435,000 who are helped to stay in school are justifying this work opportunity. They are able to make good grades—most of them are in the upper half of the student body—and they work under faculty supervision to earn their small monthly stipend.

The National Youth Administration is a sane, sound, and economical Government program and is valid from every point of view that may be projected. I believe that we should direct our efforts toward increasing the appropriation of the National Youth Administration to a sum sufficient to employ every one of the 340,000 who are already certified and awaiting assignment at this time, but who cannot get on the National Youth Administration program because there is not enough money to employ them. We cannot permit this waiting list for jobs to be jumped up by another 125,000 or more.

A reduction of $15,000,000 would have the immediate effect of cutting N. Y. A. employment by 123,000 youth—78,000 N. Y. A. jobs for enabling young people to continue their education and 45,000 jobs for out-of-school unemployed youth. It would deny the right to earn equality of educational opportunity to 78,000 potential students. It would prevent 45,000 nonschool youth from obtaining work experience and training they need in order to hold a regular job.

Reduction of the N. Y. A. appropriation is not true economy, it is waste—waste of youth resources. Unemployment among youth is the greatest menace to democracy—its results are idle minds dominated by dismay, despondency, and despair. Such minds are rusty for constructive thinking, but ripe for crime and ideology.

To many other agencies of Government a fund reduction of $15,000,000 would not be so drastic. But the N. Y. A. program is administered at the extraordinarily low per capita cost of $135 per year. What other agency or department of Government has produced equally effective results so cheaply and so economically? What other agency has received the same widespread public approval? What other agency could give substantial assistance to 123,000 persons on appropriation of $15,000,000?

In deciding upon this appropriation let us think of the value of education and employment to young people. Let us try to put ourselves in the shoes of young people who have not either the opportunity to attend school or to work. Let us consider the handicaps which youth faces without training. Think of the adults who suffer because of this lack of education or training. And finally, let us think of the ill effects which a poorly equipped citizenry will have on our society.

I favor equality of opportunity; I favor a youth population healthy in body and mind; I favor an educated citizenry. I endorse the record of the National Youth Administration and will support an appropriation of $100,000,000 for this agency. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HOUSTON. May I say to the gentleman from Ohio that this is the last speaker today.

Mr. BENDER. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, this bill before us is so important, containing so many matters of importance, that it is rather impossible to think of starting at this late hour of the day, particularly in 10 minutes, to discuss it. There are only one or two items to which I wish to address myself very briefly. My thesis mainly is the following: I believe very earnestly that with the economic situation as it is in this country today it is wrong for us to require the curtailment of any work program by so much as one person. With private employment decreasing, we are doing a very bad thing economically if we curtail employment on Government programs at the same time. There are two main items in this bill where that factor is involved. One of them is the National Youth Administration and one of them is the Civilian Conservation Corps. It has already been pointed out by previous speakers this afternoon that in the case of the National Youth Administration a cut of $15,000,000 under the appropriation for this year will mean that approximately 123,000 young people would have to be laid off the program. I shall support amendments to raise the N. Y. A. appropriation to $100,000,000. I presume that everybody is familiar with what it costs to give to one group of young people an opportunity to continue in school and to another group of young people an opportunity to earn a living and at the same time get work-training experience. Under the high-school-aid program the average cost is $4.23 per month per student. This is what these young people earn to keep themselves in school. It seems to me that this program is an integral part of the American idea of educational equality, and that to cut that program the slightest bit would be eminently wrong. Incidentally, the N. Y. A. itself has virtually no administrative expense in connection with the school-aid program. It is administered by the heads of the schools and colleges which the young people attend. On the works program it costs an average of $18.86 a month for wages to these young people. A man connected with the California State Employment Service told me one day that if all the young people between the ages of 18 and 24 who were registered at his office had had N. Y. A. training experience his placements in that age group would have been 33⅓ percent higher than they had been. That is to say that the N. Y. A. experience meant that much increase in the possibility of placing these young people in private jobs. I do not know of anything anywhere in the whole gamut of governmental activities where it is so clear that attempts at so-called economy mean that we are spending people in order to save dollars.

The N. Y. A. has been a boost to young people. It has not been a long-time employment program. We find that the turn-over of N. Y. A. employment has been between 90 and 100 percent a year on the out-of-school work projects. Of course, in the school age it is not that rapid. There are about 4,000,000 young people, it is estimated, between 18 and 24 who today are unemployed and not in school. Of these, about 9 percent are affected in some way or other by the N. Y. A. program. There are at the present, according to the best information I can get, somewhere around 300,000 young people who are actually certified to go to work on the N. Y. A. who cannot be put to work because of lack of funds. I think it is the wrong time to add to this confusion, which is just what it is, in the minds of the youths by requiring another 123,000 young people to be placed in that same position by taking from them the opportunity which N. Y. A. work affords.

I would like to indicate in the few moments what some other people beside myself think about this N. Y. A. program. The California Legislature at its last session, which was certainly not a session marked by its generosity in making appropriations, nevertheless voted 65 to nothing to allocate one-half of 1 percent of all State relief funds for the sponsoring of N. Y. A. relief projects.

This is the same legislature that made reductions in the appropriations in general for relief, which were very severe and which have resulted in cuts in the ordinary budgets of California people who are unfortunate enough to be on relief of about 40 percent.

Raymond Clapper, on January 31, wrote a column about N. Y. A., which I inserted in the RECORD. I would like to read one paragraph from that column. It is as follows:

> Even if N. Y. A. is going to add a few million dollars to the national debt, I as a taxpayer consider it a good investment—insofar as the money goes to these students and not to padded overhead. For here you are giving a chance to the most ambitious young men and women, the ones with real stamina. They are willing to put themselves through work that would be disdained by eastern college boys who are being educated on dad's checkbook to grow up as smug reactionaries. This country will be better off for these young people who, in 2 or 3 years, will be out teaching the next generation.
> I could write much more and give you more facts. But it isn't popular copy. Some people might think I was a "red"—those people who don't know Americanism when they see it.

I believe that this N. Y. A. program is the best immediate answer that we have to anybody who might attempt to teach doctrines to the young people of this country that we do not want them to learn. The problem that we face is a great national problem. Our young people have had nothing whatsoever to do with bringing about the situation of unemployment. They are not the people to be asked to pay the price for our failure to solve it more quickly. It is our minimum duty to see to it that not a single one of those young people has to be laid off this year as a result of our action.

I have a letter that I unfortunately do not seem to be able to put my hand on at the moment, but I can tell you about it. It is a letter from a man who used to be my boss when I worked as a clerk in the office of an automobile company. He lives in Wisconsin. He is a Republican. He has been on the Republican county committee for a long time. He has been associated more recently with the N. Y. A. He has been actively engaged in the work. In his letter he tells me that in his judgment this is one of the very best programs that we have in this country. He pays a high compliment to the way it has been run in his State and says he hopes that nothing will happen which will cause this program to be curtailed.

I would like to say a few words about the C. C. C. program. Here we have a case of a great Nation that has an unemployment problem, a Nation also which only in the last 4 or 5 years, indeed, only since the present administration came into power, has begun to realize not only the value of its natural resources but the extent to which those natural resources have been depleted; the extent to which the life-giving soil of the Nation is being washed away into the oceans.

The C. C. C. program has been an attempt to combine the energies of youth with the saving of the soil and forests and other natural resources of America for future generations. We sometimes hear people talk about passing the national debt on to the next generation. I do not want to do that. I think there are ways it could be avoided, incidentally, without curtailing any of these programs; but I am not going to speak about that today. But what could be more serious than to pass on to the next generation a Nation whose soil resources had been so seriously depleted that its agriculture could not be profitably or effectively carried on? I believe N. Y. A. and C. C. C. should both be given at least the same amount of money as they had last year. These employment programs are the wrong place to try to save money, for to the youth of America they make all the difference between feeling that you have an opportunity to build your country on the one hand and feeling that your country does not need you on the other hand.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK].

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, we have heard some very interesting talks this afternoon along the line of the unemployment problem. I am firmly convinced that there is only one way in which we are going to solve unemployment, and that is by actually getting back into employment the 9,000,000 now without jobs.

We talk about four and one-half million unemployed youths. The problem is not going to be solved through W. P. A., P. W. A., or relief organizations, although I have been one of the most consistent supporters of these efforts; but I do believe that there is a plan which if put into effect would completely wipe out unemployment in this Nation. What does W. P. A. and P. W. A. create? Yes; fine projects; they were needed, but they create static things, things that are not consumed. What we must go into is more employment in the consumer-goods industries, employment in the factories of this Nation, the 116,911 factories. If we are going to accept the program that 10,000,000 unemployed and 30,000,000 employed is the normal situation, all well and good for those who wish to accept that philosophy, but I cannot. I want to see men, both youth and middle age, employed in industry at real wages, and a real provision in the law for security for the aged. We have over $6,000,000,000 too much inventory on the shelves that cannot be taken up unless there is increased buying power. Five minutes is entirely insufficient time in which to discuss this great problem.

The 8,000,000 unemployed in 1935 would have earned about $10,000,000,000 had they been employed. Their unemployment represents a loss of $10,000,000,000 buying power in this Nation. The only way we can solve this problem is by insuring the employment of 3,000,000 additional people in the factories of this Nation. Why do I say 3,000,000? Because for every person employed in the factories two additional persons would be employed in auxiliary occupations, which would mean a total of 6,000,000 additional, making 9,000,000 all told. I would have the Government put up 40 percent of the wages of the new employment that these factories would create. In other words, 40 cents out of every dollar of new employment would be put up by Government and 60 cents by the employer in every line of work. A definite time might be set at which to fix normal employment, and from and after that date every employer of labor who added new labor to his pay roll would have assistance from the Government to the extent of 40 cents on the dollar of the employees' wages, the Government paying 40 cents and the employer 60 cents. Such a program would mean that these men would be earning wages on which they and their families could live and definitely take care of the unemployed. It would take people off of relief and put them in real jobs. A surprising thing is that it would not cost much more than W. P. A. or P. W. A. It would cost the Government about $4,500,000,000 to meet this extra subsidy, but the increased national income of over $20,000,000,000 would take care of the additional cost over and above the present program. [Applause.]

I have introduced H. R. 933, which sets up this program. It is before the Ways and Means Committee. We should have hearings. The bill provides vocational training for youth; security for those that cannot be employed because of age or physical handicap. It provides for a joint committee of the House and Senate to cooperate with labor, agriculture, and industry to set up a real permanent program for this problem, because this plan of mine would be in effect for 3 years and at the end of that period this joint committee would be ready to report on a permanent basis.

I invite you to read my bill to create 9,000,000 jobs. I feel convinced you will acknowledge it will do the job. I cannot cover its provisions in my limited time here. The youth problem must be met by meeting the problem of unemployment so that they will be able to face the world with confidence in the future and respect for their Nation. If we do not meet it, our Nation will not long endure.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF GREECE

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, today marks the one hundred and nineteenth anniversary of the independence of Greece; an independence that was achieved after 7 years of continuous struggle on the part of a subjugated, yet indomitable, race against the then mighty Turkish Empire, whose domain extended over large parts of Asia, Europe, and Africa. This latter fact, in itself, makes the success of the Greeks of the third decade of the nineteenth century the more admirable. Our own independence, also achieved a few decades earlier, under very difficult circumstances, had undoubtedly influenced the Grecian patriots in their own determination to free themselves, no matter what the cost in blood and suffering would be.

During the time that has elapsed since March 25, 1821, when the Archbishop of old Patras blessed the uprising of the people of the historic Grecian mainland and the islands of the Aegean Sea, Greece has grown in territory, and has vastly advanced in every field of human endeavor. As an example, I may mention the Greek merchant marine, many units of which are daily touching our American ports along both oceans and the Gulf, and are proudly flying the Greek flag throughout the watery expanse of our globe—about 700 of them—making an aggregate of approximately 2,000,000 tons. It comes next to that of France, and is the ninth largest in the world.

Greece and Turkey have put aside animosities of the past and, for several years now, have been showing the way to genuine cooperation and mutual respect among nations. They are doing more than quite a few other nations are doing to promote civilization, goodwill and peace, in this war-tired era of ours, when international lawlessness reigns, and small or weak nations are being devoured by larger or strong ones.

Greece, along with brave Finland and Hungary, has not forgotten her debt to the United States—in recent years. Of course, what she pays represents only partial payments on account of interest on part of the loans made to her, but the fact remains that she pays something. In other words, she is making an honest effort; an effort that is duly appreciated in this country, I am sure.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am expressing the sentiment of the House when I heartily congratulate the people of Greece, as well as our splendid Americans of Greek descent, on the occasion of the one hundred and nineteenth milestone of the precious independence of that historic land, the mother of civilization and democracy. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, Selma Super Service. Again Selma leads the world. Alabama's "Central City" shows the way.

A taxicab driver of my native town of Selma, Buddy Kynard, found an egg on the rear seat of his cab. Not knowing to whom he should return it, he pulled off a fur-lined glove, put the egg in it, and stuck the glove and the egg in the dash box of his car. Being a taxicab running 24 hours a day the egg was kept warm. On yesterday morning, Easter, the famous Easter rabbit may have laid some eggs, but the egg in the glove celebrated Easter in its own way—by giving birth to a baby chick.

I maintain that this modern use of the facilities of today for a novel purpose is worthy of the attention of Congress. If Washington follows Selma's example, and every taxi here does such double duty, broilers and friers will soon be plentiful.

Hatching by taxi, the latest practice in the poultry world. Another adventure in leadership started in one of the most progressive cities on God's earth. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE CONDITION OF THE POOR IN AMERICA AND CHANGES NEEDED IN OUR RELIEF SYSTEM

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a letter I have received from John K. Jennings, Work Projects Administrator of the State of Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, as the time is approaching when Congress must pass a relief act for the fiscal year 1941, it seems appropriate that we, as conscientious legislators, should be giving careful consideration now to the condition of the worthy destitute people of our country who deserve and must have assistance.

As much as I would like to see poverty vanish from the earth, I am impressed as I read my daily mail and as I come in contact with the situation throughout the country that we still have an appalling lot of it left with us—not only poverty but deep distress and poignant suffering. All of the time I am receiving appeals from constituents who are tramping the streets looking for work that cannot be found; whose families lack food and clothing and medical care; whose dwellings in some instances have been absolutely without heat during the subzero weather of the coldest winter we have had in many a year. The appeals that are coming to me have the ring of truth and sincerity, and I believe that the malingerers—of whom there will always be a certain number—are a small and inconsequential fraction compared with the total suffering population. With many of the writers I am personally acquainted, and I know they are as good people as you or I. Without fault of their own, they are the tragic victims of relentless economic forces.

This is the gloomy and sorrowful picture that is still before us as we prepare to frame the Relief Act for 1941. People will differ in their opinions as to what created that picture and as to why, in the moving panorama of events, the picture does not change so as to present a more pleasing vista. My own view is that there will never be any satisfactory solution of the relief problem until business and industry are given the proper stimulus and encouragement to resume normal operations and to take over into regular jobs the millions now on the relief rolls. For a long time the businessman has been the "forgotten man" of our national equation. No one in authority has warmed up to him. No one in authority has said to him, "What can I do to assist you?"

Businessmen and industrialists have had the daylights scared out of them by the enormous spending which threatens our national solvency, by excessive and burdensome taxation, and by the many unwarranted incursions of the Government into fields of private enterprise. These untoward developments have left business prostrate and hopeless, in a condition where it may truthfully be described as atrophied, or perhaps petrified would be a better word. With businessmen and other employers in this desperate state of complete prostration, is it any wonder that hundreds of my constituents, and hundreds of your constituents, are tramping the streets looking for work and not finding it? Whenever they approach a factory door they are hailed with the answer before they can open their mouths, "Sorry, but we are not hiring anyone."

As I said before, people will differ over what caused the picture, but no one can doubt the picture itself. Go to any center of population in the United States and you will see it there in all of its unloveliness. And, after all, it does not greatly matter what caused it, for the fact remains that it is there, and it must be reckoned with. It is a condition, and not a theory, that confronts us.

The inescapable realization that we have this tremendous problem on our doorstep and that it must be dealt with in a humane way is what prompts me to make the suggestions I am about to make which are born of my personal observations in my earnest efforts to serve the people of my district. According to my way of thinking, the Work Projects Administration never has been, and never will be, a satisfactory instrumentality for handling the relief situation. Quite aside from its enormous overhead cost, it is objectionable because it makes fish of one and fowl of another among our worthy unfortunates. One applicant gets on the roll and draws his $58.50 a month. Another applicant, exactly as worthy as the first, cannot get on the roll at all, and he and his family have to subsist on a food order of the township trustee amounting at most to a few dollars a week. Since it is impossible to find jobs for all eligibles on the W. P. A. rolls, the operation of the W. P. A. law inevitably divides the great relief population of the country into two groups—a fair-haired group that gets employment at a living salary and an unfortunate group that cannot get employment and must starve or subsist on hand-outs of the township trustees. This unequal treatment is a constant festering cause of distrust and jealousy and a glaring violation of the fundamental Jeffersonian theory of "equal rights to all; special privileges to none." My personal thought is that the relief problem could be better handled by Federal grants-in-aid to the States, the distribution of the funds to be on a scale that would reach every person who really needs relief and on a basis of absolute equality to all, the grants to be administered by local officials who are thoroughly familiar with the relief situation in their various communities.

But if we are to continue the illogical Work Projects Administration relief system—and I am satisfied we shall have it next year and perhaps for years to come—I for one shall vote every dollar of appropriations necessary to make it workable, or as nearly workable as it can be made. While we are making vast appropriations that are not necessary, surely we can and should appropriate a sufficient sum to relieve misery and to save and protect the great human values. When I first ran for Congress I announced that when it came to an alternative between dollars, on the one hand, and the humanities, on the other hand, my voice and my vote and my influence, for whatever they might be worth, would always be on the side of the humanities, and on that platform I still stand.

The point I wish especially to make, which I regard as fundamentally important in the further consideration of our relief problem, is that, whatever the amount of the appropriation for the Work Projects Administration for 1941 may be, arrangement should be made so that favoritism will cease and it will be distributed as equitably as it can be distributed among all worthy certified applicants. To effectuate this purpose it will be necessary, I think, to make some changes in the relief law.

First, let me say that the plan I have in mind is necessarily based on conditions as they exist in Marion County, Ind., as that is the only region on which I have full and definite information, but it is to be assumed that conditions there are typical of other cities over the country.

There are many hundreds of persons certified as eligible for W. P. A. employment who cannot be placed. A great number of these fall within the A classification, being persons with 6, 8, and 10 dependents. There are no jobs for them, and they therefore are on the relief rolls, barely keeping body and soul together. Many of these people have been on relief rolls for many months, and it obviously is undermining their health. This is especially true in the case of children. As the money and jobs are limited and are not sufficient to take care of all persons, spread of employment is vital.

Several benefits are now being paid by the Federal, State, and local units of government to persons with no means of support. In Indiana persons receiving old-age assistance get on an average of $17 per month, many less, some more. Persons receiving dependent children's aid receive $20 for the first child, $18 for the second, and gradually decreasing amounts for the others. This is reduced in some cases, according to the standard of living of the family, and the average amount being paid is somewhere between $40 to $50 for families of five and six. Widows of veterans receive $30 per month in most cases. Persons on relief, if single, get a grocery order of $1.45 per week, two persons get $2.05, three persons $2.45, and so forth, with a family of eight receiving $4.05. Rent is not paid unless the family is evicted, and in no case for single persons. The grocery order is supplemented in some cases with a ton of coal a month, clothing, and milk. These benefits, with the possible exception of a widow with a large family of children receiving dependent children's aid, do not in any way compare with the W. P. A. income and there is jealously and suffering. It would appear that the benefits should be standardized.

Then, too, there is a cry from employers in private industry that the W. P. A. wage is beyond what they can pay for similar duties and hours, as, for instance, in the case of domestics.

In my opinion, the following plan would go far to spread the work, standardize the relief, and eliminate competition with private employment:

Set a wage scale by the hour and give enough hours of employment to single persons to equal a wage of $25 per month; to persons with one dependent, $40 per month; two dependents, $45; three dependents, $50; four dependents, $55; and five dependents or more than five dependents, $60.

This would in no way decrease the buying power and would not decrease the wage scale. Persons on relief have no buying power and it is an economic truth that persons in the low-wage scale have to spend their entire earnings for the necessities of life. In other words, there would be a greater possibility of saving and limitation of buying power if one person received $60 per month and another was on relief than if the $60, or more than $60, was divided between the two recipients. Thirty dollars would necessarily have to be expended for food and shelter.

At first blush, those in class C—single persons—and class B, the other deferred class, might object to a lower salary than is provided in the existing scale, but they should bear in mind that under my plan they would, at least, have a chance to secure employment, though at the reduced rate, while under the employment-quota limitations now imposed on W. P. A., and likely to be imposed at all times in the future, they probably will be unable to secure employment at all, because there will always be enough persons in the A classification to consume the entire quota. After all, a single person has to live and a wage of $25 a month is better than no wage at all.

The great virtue of my proposed plan is that it would spread the money so that many who are now on trustees' relief, which is hardly sufficient to keep body and soul together, would get work jobs on W. P. A., to which they are entitled if W. P. A. benefits are to be spread universally and equitably, as they should be spread.

On February 28, the last date for which complete statistics are available, there were in the United States 2,325,896 persons on W. P. A. work-relief rolls, but there were 1,000,000 others equally eligible for employment and equally worthy who cannot get work. In my home State, Indiana, there were 65,063 on the W. P. A. and 27,000 other eligibles who cannot get on the W. P. A. under the existing provisions of the law. Of these 27,000, about 3,500 are in my home city, Indianapolis. In all fairness and justice do we not owe the same duty to the 1,000,000 in the Nation, the 27,000 in Indiana, and the 3,500 in Indianapolis, to help them to get employment that we owe to their more fortunate fellow citizens who are already on the rolls?

Some other changes in the law and in the administrative practice under the law are worthy of our consideration. I think at this time the 18-month provision, requiring all on work relief to leave the rolls for at least 30 days after 18 months' service, may be right in principle. It keeps the rolls from being frozen and it affords the 1,000,000 eligible unemployed almost the only hope they now have left of ever being given W. P. A. employment. However, in its present form it is too harsh. Under its operation all who are on W. P. A. 18 months automatically go off, regardless of their circumstances. A relief worker may have an invalid wife and a dozen dependent children, but he goes off the roll automatically the same as persons with few responsibilities.

A little flexibility should be written into the law to permit the Administrator to exempt from the automatic dismissal order a relief worker when he—the Administrator—is convinced that exceptionally cruel and inhuman hardship would result from his dismissal. Another amendment I would advocate would give a veteran's wife a preferential right to employment if the veteran is unable to work, and I would give a preference also to a veteran's widow. Similar preferential rights are given to wives and widows of veterans generally in the public service, and I do not know of any good reason why the same should not extend to W. P. A. employment. Proper limitations also should be thrown around the so-called 5-day provision. This is the administrative rule which marks for dismissal workers who fail to report for duty 5 consecutive days. It would appear that in the way this provision is now being administered some very worthy persons are being unjustly penalized. People cannot help getting sick, and there are many other bona fide reasons why they cannot always report on time. Many letters have come to my office from workers stating that, although they furnished doctors' certificates explaining and justifying their absence, they have not been able to secure reinstatement on the rolls. Some of those who were off 5 days without being in any way at fault have been 13 months trying to get back on the rolls, but without success.

Another change in the law I think might well be made would be an amendment providing that a larger percentage of relief workers shall be employed in the various activities connected with administration, such as office work.

After all, this is a relief law and why should not eligible relief applicants be employed in administrative positions which they are capable of filling, rather than others who are not in need of relief? One advantage would be that the relief money would go much further, because every non-relief administrative employee is paid a much higher salary than the earnings of a relief worker.

My mail is proof of the fact that there are many competent clerks, stenographers, typists, teachers, and others among certified relief applicants who would be glad to have the opportunity to do administrative work. The law needs to be recast in this particular, as well as in others.

Consideration may also properly be given, I think, to amending the sponsorship provision that has been in existence since January 1, 1940, requiring the sponsor to provide a flat 25-percent contribution to the cost of the project. While I believe thoroughly in local responsibility and the obligation of local units in the matter of relief, yet the fact remains that in many localities resources have become so depleted that insistence on the 25-percent provision will mean that there will be no projects and that the W. P. A. will collapse insofar as those communities are concerned. At the present time in my home county there are approximately 4,000 families, eligible and certified, awaiting W. P. A. employment who cannot be taken care of, due to lack of projects. If we are to maintain the W. P. A. system, I believe some sort of flexibility will have to be introduced into the sponsorship provision. I will close my remarks by presenting a letter dealing with the sponsorship problem from John K. Jennings, the Indiana work-projects administrator. It is as follows:

FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY,
WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION,
Indianapolis, Ind., January 25, 1940.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: With regard to an expression of my views on the sponsorship provision contained in the current act, in general, I am of the opinion that the fundamentals of the provision are both desirable and operative. However, I believe that some modifications, if adopted, would serve to correct certain existing objectionable features and result in a more equitable administration of the law.

It is my thought, based upon experience in applying this phase of the act, that it has been made too inflexible, with the result that it forces an undue hardship upon economically and financially distressed counties where the need for a work program is really greatest.

As you know, this provision in its present form provides for a flat 25 percent sponsor contribution throughout the State. Theoretically the State administrator can vary such conditions at his own discretion as long as the stipulated State average is maintained. Actually, however, such discretionary powers are nonexistent. It is impossible to overcome the losses incurred in low sponsor contributions with corresponding higher contributions from other localities for the reason that sponsors, in general, demand equal treatment. In consequence of this fact it is a financial impossibility for certain distressed areas to maintain a sufficient number of projects for their local eligible unemployed.

I know you are familiar with the so-called stranded population groups here in our own State. I refer to the coal and stone sections, where, because of mechanical improvements, coupled with economic upheaval within the industry, many skilled workers in these fields are not only without employment but can look forward with no hope whatever of ever again being employed in the industry for which they have been trained. In these localities the unemployment load is exceptionally high and the need for a work program is greatest. Local tax rates have actually increased to the point of being confiscatory. Tax delinquencies are correspondingly high. In some of these counties over one-half of the population is now receiving some form of public assistance.

It is utterly impossible to conceive of governmental units in these localities sponsoring projects sufficient to take care of their unemployed and, at the same time, meet existing sponsor contribution requirements.

It is also unfair to compel such a group to meet the same restrictions in these respects as are required of sponsors in the more prosperous areas. It is my feeling that if some flexibility were injected into the present law in order to relieve this distressed group, little difficulty would be experienced in requiring the remaining sponsors throughout the State to comply with the regulation in its present form.

I recognize that the congressional appropriation committee might entertain some objection to a greater liberalization along the lines which I have mentioned for the reason that they lack the confidence that certain W. P. A. officials would administer the law in strict accordance with its true intent. It is my thought, however, that if such a feeling exists, it should call for corrective measures along other lines and would not justify failure to correct legislation which might be at the present time reacting against localities in greatest need of assistance.

If I can be of any assistance in providing you with further information on this or kindred subjects, please do not hesitate to call upon me.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN K. JENNINGS,
State Administrator.

[Applause.]

SENATE

TUESDAY, MARCH 26, 1940

(Legislative day of Monday, March 4, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, who knowest our necessities before we ask and our ignorance in asking: Help us to perceive what we most really need, that we may truly unburden our hearts in Thy presence, and at Thy feet may feel no disquiet with Thy goodness and mercy about us. Make us especially mindful of the needs of others, as we thank Thee for those who love us and in whose love we find a quiet sanctuary when the ills of life oppress us, that we may bear one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ. Pity and pardon us, dear Lord, if at close of day our achievements fall short of the morning's dream, and be Thou patient with us, for Thou knowest our frame, Thou rememberest that we are but dust.

Bless all the people of our beloved land, prosper their endeavors, sanctify their homes, purify their hearts, and renew a right spirit within them that, making them truly blessed, our Nation may become an instrument of blessing to the world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to taxes on incomes, inheritances, and gifts

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Rhode Island, That application be, and it hereby is, made to the Congress of the United States of America to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration: Provided, That in no case shall the maximum rate of tax exceed 25 percent.

"SEC. 3. The maximum rate of any tax, duty, or excise which Congress may lay and collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of or intended to take affect in possesson or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift, shall in no case exceed 25 percent.

"SEC. 4. The limitations upon the rates of said taxes contained in sections 2 and 3 shall, however, be subject to the qualification that in the event of a war in which the United States is engaged creating a grave national emergency requiring such action to avoid national disaster, the Congress by a vote of three-fourths of each House may for a period not exceeding 1 year increase beyond the limits above prescribed the maximum rate of any such tax upon income subsequently accruing or received or with respect to subsequent devolutions or transfers of property, with like power, while the United States is actively engaged in such war, to repeat such action as often as such emergency may require.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on incomes for any period ending on or prior to said 31st day of December laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

"SEC. 6. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight on the last day of the sixth month following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect."

And be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, requested to provide as the mode of ratification that said amendment shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution of the United States, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he hereby is, directed to send a duly certified copy of this resolution to the Senate of the United States and one to the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Council of the City of Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the proposal that in future appropriations for continuation of the work-relief program under the Work Projects Administration the sponsor's 25-percent contribution necessary for the proposed project, designed to provide useful work for unemployed citizens, be based upon the magnitude of the local relief problem and ability of the local sponsoring body to provide such contribution rather than upon any fixed minimum percentage of the costs of the project, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DELEGATION OF CERTAIN FUNCTIONS BY THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1955), to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to delegate certain regulatory functions, and to create the position of Second Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the text of the bill and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "That as used in this Act—

"(a) The term 'regulatory order' means an order, marketing agreement, standard, permit, license, registration, suspension or revocation of a permit, license, or registration, certificate, award, rule, or regulation, if it has the force and effect of law, and if it may be made, prescribed, issued, or promulgated only after notice and hearing or opportunity for hearing have been given.

"(b) The term 'regulatory function' means the making, prescribing, issuing, or promulgating of a regulatory order; and includes (1) determining whether such making, prescribing, issuing, or promulgating is authorized or required by law, and (2) any action which is required or authorized to be performed before, after, or in connection with, such determining, making, prescribing, issuing, or promulgating.

"SEC. 2. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture deems that the delegation of the whole or any part of any regulatory function which the Secretary is, now or hereafter, required or authorized to perform will result in the more expeditious discharge of the duties of the Department of Agriculture, he is authorized to make such delegation to any officer or employee designated under this section. The Secretary is authorized to designate officers or employees of the Department to whom functions may be delegated under this section and to assign appropriate titles to such officers or employees. The position held by any officer or employee while he is designated under this section, and vested with a regulatory function or part thereof delegated under this section, shall be allocated to a grade, not lower than grade 7, in the professional and scientific service provided for by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, or to a grade, not lower than grade 14, in the clerical, administrative, and fiscal service provided for by such Act, as amended. There shall not be in the Department at any one time more than two officers or employees designated under this section and vested with a regulatory function or part thereof delegated under this section. The Secretary may at any time revoke the whole or any part of a delegation or designation made by him under this section.

"SEC. 3. Whenever a delegation is made under section 2, all provisions of law shall be construed as if the regulatory function or the part thereof delegated had (to the extent of the delegation) been vested by law in the individual to whom the delegation is made, instead of in the Secretary of Agriculture. A revocation of delegation shall not be retroactive, and each regulatory function or part thereof performed (within the scope of the delegation) by such individual prior to the revocation shall be considered as having been performed by the Secretary.

"SEC. 4. The provisions of section 2 shall not be deemed to prohibit the delegation, under authority of any other provision of law, of the whole or any part of any regulatory function or other function to any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture.

"SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

B. K. WHEELER,
ELMER THOMAS,
CHAS. L. MCNARY,
G. W. NORRIS,
L. B. SCHWELLENBACH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

MARVIN JONES,
H. P. FULMER,
CLIFFORD R. HOPE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the conference report?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator briefly explain the point at issue?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah will remember that last year I made an explanation to him on the floor of a bill which provided for the establishment of the position of Assistant Secretary of Agriculture to handle regulatory matters within the Department. The House changed the bill to provide that the Secretary may delegate such authority to two individuals within the Department who are in the highest grades of the civil service, doing away with the establishment of a new position. The Senate conferees accepted the philosophy of the House bill but changed the language in some respects which are not particularly important.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the consideration of the report.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the issue before the Senate, the problem before the Congress today, is not a new problem nor is it one which has not been discussed very much at length. Anyone addressing himself to the subject must of necessity travel over already traveled ground. Thus we become somewhat discouraged, because some of the expressions we shall be compelled to make have been made by much more forceful lips than ours.

Mr. President, I read in the press of yesterday that an outstanding Member of the Senate of the United States is to deliver over the radio an address in which he plans to outline the issues of the next campaign. When I read that article I was struck with the thought: How simple it would be to declare that which should be the issue of the next campaign.

Mr. President, America as a constitutional democracy must awake to its own failing; and some authority, some party, some group, must very shortly make by its platform an issue of that which constitutes the real issue in America today.

If I speak as I hope to do, I shall speak without regard to party lines as parties are now formed. I believe there is in formation in America a group that leans more to American constitutional democracy than do either of the parties now in existence. If that group is not formed, if there arises out of the conditions prevailing today no great group of American citizens who, looking back to the days of the formation of this Government, declare again for the principles of constitutional democracy, I fear with the gravest fear and the most serious thought the results which must flow out of that which we have created in the past—yea, I have lent my efforts to the creation of some of it—in which, if you please, we have lost sight of the organic law which made America great among the nations; in which, if you please, we have lost sight of the things which were reserved by the people, to the people, for the people; of the things that were relinquished by the people to something over which the people had only a secondary control.

All powers not delegated in the Constitution, the organic law, to the Federal Government, were reserved to the States or to the people thereof. The problem before the Senate of the United States today—the pending business, if you please—brings to mind history reaching almost beyond the memory of man; but it brings to mind history which touches us very closely.

There was a day in the history of the parent country whence we took our independence when, from out the star-chamber proceeding and from out the realm of the throne of Great Britain, there came everything in the way of mandate as to taxation. Little by little the people of Great Britain tore down that power. Little by little they declared that the right of taxation should remain in the Commons, the people of Great Britain. Two kings were deposed because they had exercised arbitrary power in laying taxes and the imposition of taxes for revenue. Men rose to fame because they struggled against that power. Out of it all there came that which history has recorded, that which America must not lose sight of, the thing that the founders of the Constitution of this country sought to declare so that the world might know that if there was a people in all the earth that sought to protect the rights of the lowly—the little fellow, if you please—it was the constitutional democracy which would be formed in the Western Hemisphere. So we reserved to Congress the right to tax. We reserved to Congress the right to make appropriations that would utilize the money acquired from the people by way of taxation.

We did more than that. Following the principles which had come to us by precept and example from the parent country and its history, we gave the privilege and the power and the prerogative of taxation to the House which represented the mass of the people of the country. We said that bills involving taxation should originate in the House of Representatives. Then we gave to the Senate the right to amend, the right to do what it might with a bill, under the rules, if you please, after it came to the Senate.

What are we dealing with today? We are dealing with taxation. We are dealing with the raising of revenue. We are dealing with a problem which, as I said a moment ago, has cost kings their heads, has caused men to go to war, has aroused the populace of the countries of the world, so much so that even in the modern day—long after we had formulated our Constitution, retaining these powers in the people—younger nations in our own hemisphere are now seeking to negotiate with us as to taxation that would be involved upon us through reciprocal trade, have refused to concur until they had submitted the matter to the bodies in their governments which represented the people.

Mr. President, I digress for a moment now in amplification of the thought I have just expressed to say that we have executed under the delegated power 22 treaties with foreign countries. This body did not participate in the making of a single one of those treaties. Congress did not participate in the making of a single one of those treaties. How different it was with those governments with which the treaties were negotiated. Of the 22 nations with which we dealt by way of negotiation 19 of them have demanded, in one way or another, that the treaties should go back to the legislative bodies of the respective governments which were negotiating the treaties. In 19 cases they went back, and in many of those cases the treaties themselves awaited the action of the legislative bodies of those respective governments for months and months.

So other nations of less maturity than the great Republic of the Western Hemisphere, other countries which have taken precept and example from us in the formation of their governments, have been more diligent and zealous in maintaining the principles of their organization of government than have we, because in not a single instance have we brought back to this body, as the treaty-ratifying body, in not a single instance have we brought back to the Congress of the United States the question of approbation of the trade agreements which have been made, which cannot under any guise whatever be called other than treaties.

Mr. President, if I were to look for authority in support of my position today that this whole program of the formation of treaties with foreign countries is contrary to the very letter and spirit of the Constitution, I would not look further than what was said by the man whose name is today mentioned as a possible and perhaps the probable candidate of the Democratic Party for President in the next campaign. I would not look further than that man who for 7 years has advocated this policy, and who for 7 years has been the Secretary of State of the United States. Let me read what he said when, as a Member of the House of Representatives, representing in part the great sovereign State of Tennessee on the floor of Congress, dealing with the flexible clause of the Smoot-Hawley bill, which was much more constitutional, if such a thing be constitutional at all, than that with which we are now dealing. I read the language of that outstanding statesman, that splendid character, who has represented the United States in the State Department for 7 years. I read his language as he delivered it on May 13, 1929, on the floor of the House of Representatives in dealing with the Smoot-Hawley bill. He said, as I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Mr. Chairman, the proposed revision provides in effect that the valuation by appraisers shall be final except by appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury. This astonishing proposal strips bare the jurisdiction of the Customs Court and its authority to adjudicate unquestioned and hitherto unchallenged rights of the citizens. This is bureaucracy run mad. The very suggestion that the most valuable property rights of the citizen can be disposed of or dealt with as a finality by the Treasury Department without the slightest recourse to the courts of the country is wholly impossible to understand.

Continuing he said—and this is Mr. Cordell Hull, now the great Secretary of State, now the advocate of the policy with which we are dealing:

> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible-tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English king the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion—

O Senators, listen to what the Secretary of State said, and what he quoted approvingly:

As has been said on a former occasion, this is too much power for a bad man to have, or for a good man to want.

Can there be anything more cogent, more expressive of the situation, more in answer to the whole argument that is made on the other side of the question? Can a word be uttered which would be more final, more definite, more decisive, than that which came from the lips of the highly regarded, very worthy, splendid man, who represented his State in the lower House of Congress at that time and now occupies the position of Secretary of State of the United States?

He continued:

We have recently witnessed the astounding spectacle of Congress in session engaged in the work of enacting tariff legislation, while the President, assuming equal and coordinate authority, has undertaken to anticipate Congress by legislating himself while the session of the legislative body is in progress.

Mr. President, that is exactly what has been going on since we enacted the 1934 Tariff Act. While Congress was in session here, while the Senate of the United States was in session here, there was sitting in Washington a group not Members of Congress; not Members of the Senate of the United States; not the representatives of the people chosen by the people to represent the people, but a group of appointees, capable men, no doubt; able men, I dare say, but in nowise responsible to the people, doing that which the organic law said we, the chosen representatives of the people, should do. So we are asked to allow this group to continue to do what we should do. We are asked to reenact something which, in my judgment, only represents one more decisive step toward the tearing down of the Constitution of the United States.

I go back now to a thought which I expressed just a little while ago, that if I were formulating a policy for a great party in this country, I would formulate one plank expressed in a very homely way—to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States.

I say to my Democratic brethren on this side of the aisle that unless democracy and the Democratic Party soon come around to that thought, the people will bring them around to it, because the people are thinking in terms of those indelible principles written into the organic law by which the rights of the people have been sustained for 150 years.

Mr. President, is there anything in all the world that more impinges upon the humble individual who struggles from day to day for his existence; is there anything that more intimately touches his life than the burden of taxation? Is there any time at which he seeks to hold his representative more responsible than when his representative brings upon him a debt which he must pay even at the sacrifice of his most sacredly acquired property? Certainly the answer is that there is nothing which touches the individual more closely than taxation. That being true, it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to say when a tax shall be imposed, how heavy it shall be, when it should terminate, and where the money acquired by taxes should go.

Mr. President, ours is a government in which the people are the sovereign, because the people constitute a collective power, and the people hold that power forever in their hands.

Today we have before us something which, to my mind, seeks to tear down the right of the people to exercise that collective power; something which delegates that which was a collective power to someone who determines its limitations and then hands it over to the Executive to exercise, in spite of the fact that all that responsibility, all that obligation, all that power was by the organic law specifically placed on the shoulders of Congress.

Mr. President, how far does the proposed legislation go? How far has it been construed as going by its own adherents—by those who administer it? It goes so far that it sets aside the very act which you and I put through Congress after days and days of consideration and debate. The legislation goes so far as to set aside the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued after a treaty has been ratified by this body by a two-thirds vote, because the act as it has been applied—as it has been construed—sets aside treaties negotiated by the President and approved by this body.

If any Senator doubts that, I may say that not long ago some very able United States Senators sought to increase the tariff with respect to certain commodities coming into this country—particularly vegetable oil. The able Senator from Iowa, the able Senator from Texas, and other Senators were interested in that subject. They introduced a bill to provide for an increase of tariff with respect to the importation into the United States of vegetable oils. When that bill was submitted to the Committee on Finance, the Secretary of State, having in mind the law that we are now about to continue for another 3 years, wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Finance in which the Secretary of State warned the chairman of the committee that such legislation was violative of agreements already entered into with certain European countries.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I should be very happy if the Senator would have the clerk read that communication.

Mr. McCARRAN. I have two letters before me. One has to do with Hawaii, as I remember, and the other has to do with the general situation. I will send the latter letter to the desk, as I think it covers more ground.

Mr. President, at the suggestion of the able Senator from Oregon, I send to the desk and ask that the clerk read the letter of Secretary of State Hull of date February 27, 1939, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 27, 1939.

The Honorable PAT HARRISON,
Chairman, Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: An amendment to H. R. 3790, intended to be proposed by Senator CONNALLY and which has been referred to the Senate Finance Committee, has come to my attention. This bill provides for an increase from 3 to 5 cents per pound in the tax imposed by section 602½ of the Revenue Act of 1934, as amended, on the first domestic processing of coconut oil, palm oil, palm-kernel oil, and derivatives and combinations of the foregoing.

The proposed amendment would violate international obligations of the United States contained in the trade agreements now in effect with the Netherlands and with the United Kingdom. With respect to palm-kernel oil, this amendment would violate the terms of the trade agreements with the United Kingdom, effective January 1, 1939. In this agreement the United States guarantees that "no Federal internal tax in excess of the rate of 3 cents per pound now provided for in section 602½ of the Revenue Act of 1934, as amended, shall be imposed in the United States in respect of palm-kernel oil." This guaranty is contained in a note to the item in schedule IV which provides for a duty reduction on palm-kernel oil (par. 54 of the Tariff Act of 1930) and is repeated in a note to another item in the same schedule which provides for the continued duty-free status of expressed or extracted palm-kernel oil, rendered unfit for use as food or for any but mechanical or manufacturing purposes (par. 1732).

With respect to palm oil, the proposed amendment would constitute a violation of the trade agreement with the Netherlands, effective February 1, 1936. In that agreement the United States guarantees that "no Federal internal tax in excess of the rate of 3 cents per pound now provided for in section 602½ of the Revenue Act of 1934 shall be imposed in the United States in respect of palm oil the production of the Netherlands or any of its overseas territories." This guaranty is contained in a note to the item in schedule II which provides for the continued duty-free status of expressed or extracted palm oil (par. 1732).

While the existence of these obligations alone is sufficient reason for not adopting the amendment in question, it may not be inappropriate to refer to the benefits which have been realized from the agreements of which these concessions are a part.

These commitments were made as a result of the most careful consideration by the competent departments of the Government, and hearings, at which all interested parties were given an opportunity to present their views. They constitute a part of the concessions in return for which valuable concessions were obtained from the United Kingdom and the Netherlands on behalf of American agriculture and industry.

The benefits secured for American agriculture in the trade agreement with the United Kingdom are of the utmost importance. The United Kingdom is by far the largest foreign market for American farm products. Commitments made by the United Kingdom in the agreement cover about 92 percent of our total agricultural exports to the United Kingdom on the basis of 1936 statistics.

As a result of trade agreement with the Netherlands, American farmers, manufacturers, and labor have received substantial benefits. The value of American products imported into the Netherlands and the Netherlands India in 1937 showed an increase of $44,000,000 as compared with 1935, the year immediately preceding the conclusion of the trade agreement. More than half of this $44,000,000 increase is accounted for by imports of American products on which concessions were obtained in the agreement.

I have received a communication from the Netherlands Legation, in which exception is taken to the proposed amendment and which reads in part as follows:

"As the action proposed by Senator CONNALLY would violate the provision above referred to of the trade agreement and would result in a virtual prohibition of the importation of palm oil from the Netherlands and its overseas territories, I should feel obliged if Your Excellency would grant his good offices so that the enactment of the amendment in question may be averted."

My attention has also been called by Mr. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State and chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Philippine Affairs, to the effect of the proposed amendment of Senator CONNALLY upon our relations with the Philippines.

Less than 2 months prior to the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1934, section 602½ of which imposed a tax of 3 cents per pound on the first domestic processing of certain oils, including coconut oil wholly of Philippine production or produced wholly from materials of Philippine growth or production, the Congress passed the act of March 24, 1934, entitled "An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes." In this latter act, certain provisions of which were designed to terminate the preferred status of Philippine articles in the United States market in a gradual and orderly manner, was included a provision imposing the full duty on all Philippine coconut oil brought into the United States in excess of 200,000 long tons in any year. In other words, the Philippine Independence Act contemplated the duty-free entry into the United States of 200,000 long tons of Philippine coconut oil annually during the period prior to the independence of the islands.

The processing tax contained in the Revenue Act of 1934 was therefore directly contrary to the purposes of the Independence Act, as the President pointed out in a message to the House of Representatives (73d Cong., 2d sess., Doc. No. 388). The proposed amendment, by increasing the processing tax, would depart still further from the purposes of that act.

Furthermore, the Interdepartmental Committee on Philippine Affairs has recently made public a report on trade relations between the Philippines and the United States with certain recommendations for modifications of the Independence Act of 1934, which have been incorporated in S. 1028, on which the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Senate is currently holding hearings. This bill, approved by the Philippine executive and legislative authorities, provides for an annual duty-free quota of 200,000 long tons of Philippine coconut oil, declining gradually by 5 percent of this amount annually from 1940 to 1961. The proposed amendment might endanger the entire Philippine program now being considered by the Senate.

In view of the urgency of having this information reach your committee immediately, in order that it may be given consideration at the time the bill is taken up by the Senate, this letter has been sent to you directly, and it has not been possible to ascertain the opinion of the Bureau of the Budget on the proposed amendment.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in that letter and the substance thereof we find a situation revolutionary of everything the founders of this Government had in mind. Members of the Senate of the United States, representing sovereign States, representing the industries of separate communities, sought to have additional safeguards thrown around those industries, safeguards which would probably encourage agriculture in this country and would probably reduce the relief rolls in their respective communities. With that purpose in mind they introduced measures seeking the protection of American industry. They were immediately confronted by the letter of the Secretary of State, saying that their proposed amendment to the tariff law would be detrimental to and destructive of an agreement which the State Department, without consultation with Congress, had entered into with a foreign country.

If the letter of the Secretary of State can be read in any other light than that of an effort on the part of the Secretary of State to protect and encourage a certain industry abroad to the detriment of industry at home, then I do not read the letter aright. This letter came from the Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, who had used the following language when, as a Representative in Congress, he sought to defeat the very thing which he now seeks to put through this body:

This proposal embraces another revolutionary policy, which is, to abandon the law and the Republican doctrine to the effect that all tariffs should be measured by the difference between production costs here and abroad, by adding a number of alternative so-called methods to ascertain what is termed "conditions of competition between this and other countries." It is proposed thus to give the President and his Tariff Commission, which, by the way, is virtually taken away from Congress, authority to use what in practical effect will be any sort of basis on which to fix tariff rates.

The letter read by the clerk a moment ago emphasizes the fallacy of the thing which Secretary of State Hull opposed when he was a Member of Congress. We are now confronted with a similar proposal which not only seeks to take from Congress the taxing power—because every tariff is a tax—but which likewise seeks to take from this body a function which was given to it most exclusively: Namely, the ratification of treaties made between this independent Government and a foreign independent government.

But there is more to it than that, Mr. President. Not only has the State Department gone so far as to say that a Member of Congress may not introduce a bill to protect the rights of his home State; not only has the Secretary of State, administering the law as it is now, sent word to Congress that it dare not amend the tariff law because it would be violative of some agreement in which we had no part; but, in addition, I hold in my hand a copy of what is known as the reciprocal-trade agreement between the United States of America and the Belgo-Luxemburg Economic Union, an agreement executed between this country and Belgium, which says:

As long as the present agreement—

Referring to the reciprocal-trade agreement executed without the participation of this body or the body on the other side of the Capitol—

As long as the present agreement shall remain in force, it shall supersede any provisions of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, concluded March 8, 1875, which may be inconsistent with the said agreement.

A treaty had existed between this country and the Belgians since 1875. That treaty, which dealt with trade and commerce, had been negotiated by the President of the United States, and, after negotiation by the President of the United States, had been submitted to the United States Senate, the only constitutional body which had the right to ratify it. The treaty had been ratified by the Senate of the United States and had remained in existence from the day of its ratification until a separate agreement—it is called an agreement—was entered into between the State Department and the Kingdom of Belgium, which agreement declared that the act of the Senate was to be set aside and declared null and void and of no effect so long as the new agreement existed.

It is said that the reciprocal trade agreements are not treaties. They are supertreaties. They are treaties which abrogate other treaties. So, being treaties, they must be regarded in the light of the Constitution; and if regarded in the light of the Constitution, they must be brought back to this body for ratification.

But that was not the only instance. I hold in my hand a copy of the reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Colombia, which declares, in article XI:

As long as the present agreement remains in force, it shall supersede any provisions of the Treaty of Peace, Amity, Navigation, and Commerce between the United States of America and the Republic of New Granda, signed at Bogota, December 12, 1846, which may be inconsistent with this agreement.

Again we find a treaty which had been promulgated by the President of the United States, in this instance with Colombia. After its promulgation it had been submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification, and had been ratified by that body. However, we find it set aside by the State Department in one fell swoop, without opportunity for this body, which ratified the original treaty of 1846, to have a word in the promulgation or formation or ratification of the new agreement.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does not the Constitution of the United States provide that the Constitution and the laws enacted thereunder and treaties made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land?

Mr. McCARRAN. The Constitution provides that the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted thereunder and treaties made pursuant thereto constitute the supreme law of the land.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. How, then, can a treaty be set aside by an agreement?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am at a loss to know, except as we see it done.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is it in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution to have such procedure?

Mr. McCARRAN. In no way whatever. That brings me to the thought—and I am glad the Senator interrupted me—that there is a complete answer coming from the State Department to the question whether the so-called trade agreements are treaties. They are so treated by the State Department.

Let me refer to another matter in the same line of thought. Not only do trade agreements made by the United States and another country become effective as between the two, but read into the agreement, is what is known as the most-favored-nation clause. Let me use an illustration that touches very closely the interests of two Senators, one of whom does me the honor to be present today, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY]. It touches very closely my own State and touches other States as well. Under the treaty with Brazil, whereby we reduced our tariff rates on manganese, that commodity is brought into this country as ballast, if you please, in ships belonging to the United States Steel Corporation, which owns the manganese mines of Brazil. The effect has been practically to close the manganese mines of Montana, of Nevada, and of other manganese-producing States. When the manganese mines of the States of this country were closed the miners had to go on the relief rolls. Thus the result of the importation into the United States of a commodity produced by peon and slave labor in Brazil has been highly destructive of the welfare of a class of American workers.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator recall that at a former session of this, the Seventy-sixth Congress, in an effort to offset somewhat the injury caused by the act now referred to by the Senator from Nevada, the Congress authorized the appropriation of $100,000,000 of the taxpayers' money, in order to subsidize the production of manganese and other strategic materials in the United States?

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator is correct.

We appropriated $100,000,000 by way of authorization, and we have recently passed a bill appropriating a part of that $100,000,000 for the purchase of strategic metals, of which manganese is one.

The Senator's suggestion brings to mind the further thought that we are using the taxpayers' money in order to try to develop within our own borders metals, strategic in their nature, for national defense, so that when the time comes when we may need the metals we will have them. Yet, we are encouraging their being brought into our country from foreign countries under reciprocal-trade agreements.

I do not want, in my argument, to go too far into the factual side of this question. I prefer rather to deal with what, in my judgment, is the constitutional and legal side of the question, because, under my conscience, regardless of how highly I may favor the good neighbor policy of the present administration, I cannot look upon this program as being other than violative of the Constitution of the United States. I cannot take any other view than that there should be transmitted to the Senate every so-called reciprocal agreement, so that this body may examine the instrument as a treaty and say whether or not it shall become effective and whether or not it impinges upon the rights, liberties, and welfare of the taxpaying public of America.

Where on earth is there a question more vital to the Nation and to its people than one which pertains to taxes? Where on earth is there a question more vital to the Nation, and to the people thereof, than a measure which reduces the revenue, which, in turn, has an effect on taxation? That being the most vital question, the framers of the Constitution desired that it should be submitted always to the people themselves. Looking regardfully to the rights of the people, they went further than that by saying that all treaties negotiated between the United States as a free country and other free governments should be submitted to the Senate of the United States.

But, Mr. President, we are told that trade agreements are not treaties; we are told that they are merely agreements. If the State Department itself had not regarded them as treaties, we might take with some degree of seriousness their expression and contention; but, at every step in the proceedings the State Department has regarded the reciprocal-trade agreements as treaties. Witness the most favored nation phase in connection with the agreements; witness everything there is about them, and take note of the fact that other countries that have entered into such agreements with us have regarded them as treaties, for they have submitted the agreements to their own legislative bodies for approbation before they should become effective.

There was read into the RECORD yesterday a statement of the action of other nations which have entered into reciprocal-trade agreements with the United States. Even at the hazard of repetition, I beg leave again to refer to that matter.

Agreements put into effect without subsequent legislative ratification—that is, without subsequent ratification by the foreign country—were three in number, and three only—namely, those with Belgium, Cuba, and Ecuador.

Agreements put into effect provisionally, subject to eventual legislative ratification by the foreign country, were nine in number—namely, Canada, first agreement; Canada, second agreement; Czechoslovakia, France, Netherlands, Switzerland, Turkey, United Kingdom, Venezuela.

Agreements which did not become effective until after legislative ratification—that is, legislative ratification by the foreign country—of which there were 10, were Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Finland, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Sweden.

What a glowing example was furnished, what a great precept, what a lesson was taught to the greatest republic on earth by these republics, small, if you please, many of which came into existence long after we had promulgated our Constitution. They did not override either their organic law or the will of their people, but rather they said, "We will enter into these agreements if our legislative bodies, which represent our people, approve them." To those countries such agreements are treaties; to this country we are told they are not treaties. To those countries the agreements meant something; they meant the welfare of their people; and the welfare of the people is always in the hands of those who represent the people. But to this country they had no such significance, because we did not have an opportunity even to see the agreements until they became effective. As stated yesterday on the floor, we scarcely had an opportunity to appear and know what was in the minds of those who were formulating the agreements. We might go to the Department and appear and protest to our heart's content but, to save one's life, one could not find out what they were thinking about or along what line of thought their conclusion would travel.

Mr. President, it has been stated here that the Supreme Court of the United States has approved legislation of this type. I beg to differ with those who take that position, and I have in mind, I think, every decision which has been brought to my attention, commencing with Field against Clark and coming down to the latest case, the Panama case, going through all the labyrinth of cases between the two. Not one single case outside of the Altman case even squints at the idea of these instruments not being treaties. The Altman case, if it decided anything, decided that the tariff provision in that instance was a treaty, because it said:

This is a treaty for the purpose of taking a direct appeal to this Court from the circuit court of appeals.

If it is a treaty for one purpose, I wonder how it could lose its nature in transit.

Mr. Justice Day, in writing the opinion in the case of Field against Clark, used some very cogent expressions which have become rather commonplace with us all:

That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890—in the particular under consideration is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles, should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them, that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States which the President deemed—that is, which he found to be—reciprocally unequal and unreasonable.

Which was the tariff act—in that instance the McKinley Tariff Act—

Then the opinion recites that Congress not only formulated the tariff but likewise formulated the alternative tariff which should go into effect if the President put his mandate into effect; but the one special thing that is decided in the Altman case is that the tariff provision then under consideration, whereby the President entered into an agreement with a foreign country, if it amounted to anything, amounted to a treaty. It at least amounted to a treaty sufficiently to permit a direct appeal from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States; and I submit in all fairness that if such an agreement has the nature of a treaty sufficiently to warrant it in going from the circuit court of appeals under the Circuit Court of Appeals Act, to the court of last resort of this country—and that was the decision—it cannot lose that nature anywhere in transit.

To my mind, it would be needlessly taking the time of the Senate to review the cases dealing with this subject, with which every Senator must of necessity be familiar, and which were so well recited here yesterday by my colleague on the floor.

But, Mr. President, in the Hampton case Mr. Chief Justice Taft laid his whole burden of argument, placed his whole decision on the case of Field against Clark, recited the facts which pertained to the case of Field against Clark, and then based his decision on Field against Clark. So the Hampton case can furnish no solution for those who advocate the view that these reciprocal-trade agreements are not in fact treaties.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. What is the last case in which the Supreme Court has spoken on this subject? Is that the case to which the Senator just referred, in which Chief Justice Taft delivered the opinion?

Mr. McCARRAN. No; in two cases the Supreme Court has spoken quite recently. The most recent case, as I recall, is what is known as the Panama case, in which the "hot oil" question was settled. The one just before that was the Curtiss-Wright case; but the Curtiss-Wright case had to do with an entirely different question. The Curtiss-Wright case was one in which the President of the United States, pursuant to an act of Congress, issued his Executive order prohibiting the sale of arms, ammunition, or implements of war to certain warring nations. The whole case turned on his right to issue that Executive order.

In the opinion in the Panama case, written by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, dealing with the "hot oil" law, which we passed about 1934 or 1935, as I recall, he went at length into the subject, and held that there Congress had prescribed no limitations between which the President could exercise his power to issue an Executive order, and therefore it was a delegation of legislative power from the Congress to the Executive.

I desire to quote from what, to my mind, is a prophecy which in the years to come should be remembered and will be realized unless this Congress and others having to do with like subjects put a curb on the violation of the organic law. I read from the book entitled "Our Wonderland of Bureaucracy," by that eminent and greatly beloved constitutional lawyer, formerly a Member of the House of Representatives, the late James M. Beck. I read from page 193. His language is so apropos to the subject, his expressions are so cogent, his thought is so prophetic, that it is very much worth while that we, as Members of the Senate, should pause and reflect on what he says:

In the demoralization that followed the World War and when the currencies of foreign nations were wildly fluctuating, the Congress, to meet a temporary emergency in 1921, created the first Tariff Commission, with power to raise or lower duties within a statutory margin. From a pragmatic side, something can be said in defense of this measure. From a constitutional side, nothing can be said. The author says this with due recognition of the fact that the Supreme Court, in Hampton v. United States (276 U. S. 394), with its consistent disposition to resolve all constitutional doubts in favor of congressional legislation, gave its pontifical absolution to this statute in a very unconvincing opinion. It felt constrained to accept assumptions of fact, which Congress had made, and upon these assumptions, none of which was found to be accurate in the practical trial of the law, the law was sustained. Unquestionably that opinion, which will prove a very fateful one in influencing further unconstitutional delegations of power by Congress, was influenced by the fiscal emergency, which then existed. The doctrine of emergency as a pretended justification of unconstitutional legislation may yet prove the "wooden horse," whereby the citadel of the Constitution will be taken. Nothing is more discouraging than the disposition of the Supreme Court to justify socialistic legislation, on the theory that some alleged emergency excuses it.

The epitaph of the Constitution may one day be "Ilium fuit."

Troy is gone! So, if the Congress of the United States continues to enact legislation which forever chips away the great fundamental block, the concrete foundation of this Government, if the Congress of the United States continues forever to chip away at that block, some day we will find that what Mr. Beck said as the final word, "Ilium fuit," will be "The Constitution is gone," because its defenders and its protectors, those sworn to uphold that law, will have sought to divest themselves of the duties, powers, prerogatives, and obligations which the organic law visited upon them and gave them the honor to fulfill.

Mr. President, if I were to go further to emphasize the thoughts which I entertain with reference to the contention that is made in regard to the Hampton case I would not leave this Chamber, because I would call to my assistance the language of one of the most outstanding judges eastern America ever had, a man who, coming from the bench of the great Empire State to this Chamber, brought with him all the splendor of his mind, all the courage of his character, all the training which came to him through a life spent, from his very cradle up, in listening to the heart beats of humanity, rendering decisions as he saw the law and understood it. I would not call upon another authority greater than the senior Senator from the State of New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I read language he uttered on the floor of the Senate October 1, 1929, dealing with the very question now uppermost in our consideration. He said, among other things:

Mr. President, I rise to discuss, for not too long a time, I hope, the so-called flexible provisions of the pending tariff bill.

That was the Hawley-Smoot bill.

The first subdivision of the committee amendment as modified by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] authorizes the President to change the classification of any product and to increase or decrease the rate of duty of any commodity not on the free list. The second subdivision authorizes the President to change the basis of valuation. Such a delegation of lawmaking powers to an Executive is, to my mind, unconstitutional, in that it violates the very first section of the first article of the Constitution, which vests in Congress, and solely in Congress, all legislative power. The laying of duties is a legislative power and is so specifically defined in article I, section 8, of the Constitution.

I address myself first to this argument, because in the discussions which have preceded mine, and in the Presidential announcement, it seems to have been taken for granted that the constitutionality of these provisions is no longer open to challenge. That I deny.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is calling attention to a very important declaration of a distinguished Member of this body, and it seems to me there should be a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield for that purpose?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, at the time of the interruption I was reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the very splendid expressions of our colleague, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and they are so much worth while that I will continue to read for the benefit of those who do me the honor to listen, the views of the able Senator from New York, which he expressed on October 1, 1929. He said:

After full deliberation and the closest study of the Hampton case (J. W. Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394), I am ready to assert with confidence that the flexible tariff provision does not meet the primary requirement of constitutionality.

The Hampton case, in which the Supreme Court sustained the flexible provisions of the Tariff Act of 1922, was, like every other controversy before that tribunal, decided on the basis of the facts before the Court. It is not at all an uncommon event for a court to come to a contrary decision with respect to constitutionality when a different set of facts is brought to its attention.

Right here I summon as my witness on the point I am attempting to make a case—the State of New York v. Charles Schweinler Press (214 N. Y. 395)—within the State of New York. About 30 years ago the Legislature of New York passed an act prohibiting women from working in factories during certain hours of the night. The constitutionality of that law was challenged; it went to the highest court of the State, and was there held to be unconstitutional as interfering with women's right to contract and interfering with their liberty as guaranteed in the Constitution of the United States. About 15 years thereafter a commission was appointed to investigate factory conditions in the State of New York. I had the very high honor of being chairman of that commission.

As a result of its investigation the unwholesome and insanitary conditions under which women were compelled to work in factories at night and the effect such employment had upon the health of women were brought clearly to public attention through the testimony adduced before the commission. Thereafter I introduced a bill in the legislature providing a prohibition against women working in factories during certain hours of the night.

In the preamble to the measure it was stated that the legislation was proposed to be enacted in order to preserve the health of the women of the State. The law was enacted; it was challenged as being unconstitutional, and the old Williams case was cited as an absolute precedent. The lower courts, of course, followed the prior ruling and held the law unconstitutional. It went to the State court of appeals, and I there had the privilege of appearing as counsel to defend the constitutionality of the act, of course without compensation. The court of appeals reversed its former position, held the act to be constitutional, and based its decision upon the ground that there had been submitted to the court new facts which during the consideration of the former act were not before the court, namely, that what the legislature had in mind in passing the act was to preserve the health of the womanhood of the State, which was a matter, of course, of State concern. The court of appeals held that the legislature had acted properly within its power, under the police power of the State, reversed its former attitude upon new facts, and held the law to be constitutional. In its decision, among other things, the court said:

"There is no reason why we should be reluctant to give effect to new and additional knowledge upon such a subject as this even if it did lead us to take a different view of such a vastly important question."

New facts call for new decisions and the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized that principle. In the case of Muller against Oregon, reported in Two Hundred and Eighth United States Reports, page 404, the Supreme Court said:

"When a question of fact is debated and debatable, and the extent to which a special constitutional limitation goes is affected by the truth in respect to that fact, a widespread and long-continued belief concerning it is worthy of consideration."

We must be entirely clear as to the determining principle which the Court pronounced in the Hampton case. The flexible provision of the 1922 Tariff Act was in that case approved because the Court found:

"What the President was required to do was merely to execute the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect."

The event upon which Presidential action could be invoked was the discovery that differences in the cost of production of the domestic and imported competitive article were not equalized under the existing law. Congress had implicitly stated that such differences could be accurately computed and that they could be made the measure of an administrative adjustment of rates. The Supreme Court assumed these facts because Congress had asserted them. Now, however, we know that the alleged facts are not reliable guides. We now realize that though the difference in cost of production is theoretically a fact, it cannot be converted into tariff rates without the exercise of a vast and unlimited discretion. There is now available the record of 7 years' operation, which convinces beyond a doubt that rates cannot sensibly, cannot possibly, be administratively measured by sole adherence to a mechanical standard erected by Congress.

In the reports of the Commission we find a constantly recurring division of opinion. Repeatedly certain members of the Commission select facts which lead to a higher rate of duty than the facts selected by certain other members of the Commission. Can we draw any other conclusion than that the true differences which divide the members of that body or which will divide any group of men who may constitute the Commission are matters of policy, are views respecting high or low tariff, and that facts are selected and data assembled which support such conclusions?

Mr. President, the gentleman who uttered that expression has no superior at the bar of America today. He is the senior Senator from the State of New York [Mr. WAGNER]; and he took a most decided stand in 1929, as I hope he will do in 1940.

Continuing, he said:

Mr. President, invariably the differences which destroyed the unanimity of the Commission have expressed themselves in a controversy over some question of fact. Which is the chief competing country? Where is the principal market? Are the two selected commodities comparable? Is the information collected representative of the industry? These were but the means of expressing in legally conformable language the desire to increase or decrease a particular duty. A reading of the reports submitted by the Commission compels the conclusion that the determination of every duty proceeds, and necessarily so, from a determination of policy, a determination which has in all the history of representative government been called legislation.

The President has written only two opinions, to my knowledge, which reveal the manner of the Presidential mind in coming to a conclusion under the flexible provisions of the tariff. The more interesting of the two is the opinion on sugar. Three members of the Commission had recommended to the President a decrease in duty. Two had dissented from that view. One had not participated. Under the law the President was required to make a decision governed by the differences in the cost of production. That was the statutory guide for his supposedly administrative act. How different are the considerations which prompted the President in his action when he refused to reduce the tariff as recommended by the majority of the Commission. In his opinion he reveals that he took the following matters into consideration:

That the farmer is entitled to share with the manufacturer benefits under the protective-tariff system.

The need for the revenue arising out of the sugar tariff.

That it is desirable that sugar beet be grown as a substitute for wheat in order to reduce wheat acreage; and also that sugar beet is a desirable diversifier of crops.

The desirability of becoming independent of foreign sources for an article of food supply.

The danger of foreign combinations to manipulate prices.

Concerning costs of production, he said that a wide variety of conclusions could be obtained by alternative methods of interpretation of the same basic data. That, of course, is true of every single instance that has come before the Commission. Therein is concealed that universal weapon which permits the President to decide as he will on each and every tariff schedule.

Let there be no mistake about the point I am trying to emphasize. I do not find fault with the President for taking these matters into consideration. It is not even my purpose at this time to rehearse the shameful story of the sugar investigation. All I am driving at is that we must at once realize that if this is a sample of an administrative decision then we may as well lock up the Halls of Congress. If this be a determination or a finding of the existence of a fact upon which the law of Congress takes effect then there is no longer any distinction between lawmaking and administration.

Of course, the state of the revenue must be considered, but that has ever been a congressional function. Of course, the farmer should be given the benefit of tariff legislation, but it has always been the province of Congress to determine when and how. Whether or not we must become self-sufficient in a particular commodity is, of course, a pertinent question in tariff making, but since when has that become a question of administration?

In the sugar report we have an excellent exhibit of flexible tariff in operation. We can see the considerations which enter in making a decision. I quite fully agree that those objects must be taken into consideration in writing an equitable tariff bill, but I also insist that the weighing and measuring of the precise effect to be given to such matters are in the domain of the Legislature.

Congress, and only Congress, can decide whether duties shall be so levied as to encourage and expand beet sugar—that is legislation, not administration.

Congress, and only Congress, has, by the Constitution, been given plenary authority to determine the extent of the Federal revenue and whether or not it shall be derived from the sugar consumer—that is legislation, not administration.

The court has said that the test laid down by statute was perfectly clear and intelligible. As a matter of abstract logic that is no doubt true. Now, however, we are in possession of an actual record of events, an actual experience which shows that though the test laid down by Congress may have been perfectly clear for purposes of investigation, it could not be translated into new rates of duty without the exercise of such discretion and the consideration of such matters of national policy that in all truth and in all honesty we must call it legislation.

There is one other thought on the question of constitutionality which is pertinent.

The Supreme Court is not the only guardian of the Constitution. Each one of us is under a coequal duty with the members of the bench to defend and maintain that Constitution and to vote only in favor of legislation that conforms with the requirements of that instrument. There are innumerable situations where Congress is the last resort in the determination of constitutionality, where from its decision there is no appeal to any court.

The standard of constitutionality which each one of us must apply is somewhat different from the standard which the Supreme Court employs in passing on legislation. When the constitutionality of a bill is contested in the courts every doubt is resolved in favor of constitutionality. Every fact which was assumed by Congress to be a fact is not disputed by the court unless the assumption flies violently in the face of reason.

When we in this body pass upon a bill we cannot give ourselves the benefits of those doubts. We ought not knowingly to write into the bill assumptions of fact which we know are not true. We ought not to take advantage of the Supreme Court's procedure by framing legislation which in form only is constitutional but which in substance is in deadly conflict with the requirements of our organic law.

Mr. President, one of the most disquieting facts about this controversy is the frequency with which the advocates of this transfer of legislative power to the Executive have pointed to precedents. Precedents do not make a thing right. They may only prove that we have been wrong before. At the present time we are on the crest of the wave of Presidential encroachments upon legislative territory. What at first seemed like a harmless delegation of an inconsequential power has, through accretion and addition, so multiplied the power and authority of one individual of this Government that the system of a functional balance among the three great divisions of government is well nigh upset.

And so on—dealing with the facts, dealing with the law, dealing with the question from the standpoint of a judge as well as the standpoint of a Senator. It was the opinion of the then junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]—now the senior Senator from New York—that the flexible tariff clause which was dealt with in the Hampton case was an unconstitutional and unwarranted delegation of authority.

Mr. President, I respectfully come to the expression of the leader of the majority [Mr. BARKLEY] in 1929 when this very problem was before the Senate of the United States. I say "this very problem," but the problem then under consideration was not nearly so offensive to the Constitution of the United States. It was then before this body under what was known as the flexible tariff clause of the Smoot-Hawley Act. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 1, 1929, language from the present leader of the majority, the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. He said:

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in the discussion of the question now pending before the Senate I find myself in a position of agreement with many things stated by those Senators who advocate the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I join with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] in expressing the highest regard for the work performed by the Tariff Commission in matters of investigation, in the assembling of facts, not only in the performance of their own duties in recommending rates to the President but in enabling members of the Finance Committee and of the Senate generally to have a better picture of the tariff situation, a better picture of the trade relations of our own country with other countries; and I think, on the whole, the work of the tariff experts is to be commended. I think, on the whole, the investigators sent out by the Tariff Commission have been honest, conscientious, hard-working men; and, so far as I am personally concerned, the result of their labors has been of invaluable assistance to me as a member of the Finance Committee in the consideration of this tariff bill.

However, my admiration for the work of the Tariff Commission in that respect, my confidence in the unselfish attempt on the part of its experts to obtain information for the benefit of Congress and for the benefit of the President, does not in any way cloud my judgment as to the propriety of the delegation of power involved in the pending amendment.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania—who, I regret, is not on the floor at present—undertook to justify this delegation of power by going back to the year 1794, in the administration of George Washington, and making reference to an act of that year, passed by many men in the Congress who had been members of the Constitutional Convention, and signed by the President of the United States, who happened to be the president of the convention which wrote the Constitution; and he said:

"Surely, if these men, who ought to have known what the Constitution meant, who ought to have had some conception of its powers and obligations, saw fit, almost within the shadow of the convention hall in Philadelphia, to confer upon the first President power to issue embargoes, and" as the Senator from Pennsylvania inaccurately said "to fix rates of duty upon commerce, we ought not to hesitate to do it now."

Mr. President, the exercise of that power in 1794 was not the exercise of the taxing power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. In the act referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania there is no mention of duties or imposts. There is no attempt to delegate to the President the power to levy taxes, the power either to increase or decrease rates; but the delegation of power in the act of 1794 was purely a delegation of war power because of the situation that then existed, with an impending or threatening conflict between the United States and France, and possible difficulties between the United States and Great Britain.

Continuing, the able Senator from Kentucky then said:

So that, Mr. President, in the exercise of a war power that might be found necessary during a recess or vacation of Congress, the President of the United States was not authorized to lay and collect taxes. He was not authorized to transfer commodities from one classification to another. He was not authorized to reduce or to increase any rate of tariff taxation or any other form of taxation which had been enacted by the Congress, but he was merely given the power to lay an embargo not only upon foreign ships that might be in our ports or might be headed to our ports but upon American ships transporting commerce between the United States and every other country; and even in that effort to delegate the war power to the President it was provided that it should not be exercised at any time when Congress should be in session, and that the power conferred upon the President, or any embargo laid by him under that authority, should cease within 15 days after the assembling of Congress next after the proclamation had been issued.

Continuing, the able Senator from Kentucky said:

So it does not seem quite appropriate for the Senator from Pennsylvania to seek to persuade us that because one-hundred-and-forty-odd years ago Congress empowered a President to lay an embargo upon commerce with certain foreign countries we are to take that as an example of the right or power of Congress to delegate to the President authority to levy and collect taxes.

I presume that it is, as some Senators have suggested, purely academic to discuss the constitutionality of a law upon which the Supreme Court has passed judgment; and if we are prepared to admit that the discussion of that decision and the wisdom or propriety of it is beyond cavil or question, we are at least not denied the right to discuss the wisdom of the policy.

In order that we may understand what the Constitution did, what its environment may have been, what was in the minds of the framers, it may not be entirely out of place to draw briefly a picture of the background which was responsible for it.

Our forefathers met in convention to protest against the exercise of the taxing power by the King of England without the consent of the Colonies. It was not because they objected to the size of the stamp tax. It was not because they objected to the form of that taxation as compared with any other form of taxation that might have been laid upon the Colonies by the British Crown. It was not, either, because they objected to being taxed, because it would have been infinitely cheaper, infinitely more easy and more convenient, for the colonists to have submitted to the pittance of a tax as compared to the enormous expense in treasure and blood involved in resisting the power of the mother country to tax them without giving them a voice in the processes of taxation. So, when the framers of our Constitution—many of whom had been soldiers in that war, all of whom understood the fundamental doctrines that underlay that war, many of whom had been members of the convention that promulgated the Declaration of Independence—met in Philadelphia to write a constitution, they had behind them the whole history of Anglo-Saxon conflicts of authority between the people and the Crown. And so we must, if we can, undertake to insert our eyes into their bosoms to find what actuated them in writing this Constitution under which we have lived for nearly a century and a half.

I do not desire to discuss the academic question of the wisdom of the separation of our powers into executive, legislative, and judicial; but I do desire to emphasize, if I may—and emphasis seemingly is needed now—the impropriety and the shortsightedness of undertaking to shirk the responsibility which in my judgment was irrevocably placed upon the shoulders of Congress.

I desire rather to approach this subject from the standpoint not only of its constitutionality but the wisdom of the course which is urged upon us by both sides to the controversy.

In the Constitutional Convention, which produced the instrument under which our Government has grown and prospered, there were lengthy discussions as to the functions of the three branches of the Government which were to be established. The framers of the Constitution had before them the background of events out of which had grown the Revolution and the independence of the colonies. They were particular to emphasize their determination that all legislative functions should be performed by the representatives of the people. Therefore, one of the first things which they provided was that "all legislative power shall be vested in a Congress composed of a Senate and House of Representatives," and so forth.

What did they mean by all legislative power? Did they mean all legislative power except that which Congress might at a later date attempt to shirk? Did they mean all legislative power except the power of taxation? Every part of the Constitution answers these questions in the negative. In later articles and clauses of the instrument taxation is dealt with specifically, so that we cannot doubt that the Constitution intended that all tax legislation, as well as other legislation, should be vested in the Congress.

As stipulated that all legislative power should be vested in Congress, the framers proceeded to outline some of the exclusive powers of Congress, among them being "the power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises."

What is the legislative power? The power to promulgate a rule of action by which the people who are subject to that law are to be governed in their relationship not only to one another but to this thing we call government, which is only another name for organized society. Therefore, we are compelled to draw the conclusion that among the powers included in the definition of legislative power must be included the power of taxation; for it was upon the principle of taxation largely that our independence as a Nation was established in all of the documents that accompanied our separation from the mother country. It was in the debates of the Constitutional Convention, for in that convention there were present, as there are always present in the inception of governments and in the exercise of their authority, two distinct schools of thought. One school believed that we should not confer power upon the people, and that only the educated and the well born and the wealthy should be clothed with the power of self-government, and that such blessings as the masses might enjoy under the Government should fall into their mouths as the crumbs fell into the mouth of Lazarus from the table of Dives.

On the other hand, there was the opposite of that theory, to which I have already referred, that, without regard to distinctions of wealth, without regard to distinctions of physical power or prowess, without regard to ancestry, without regard to education or ignorance, every man upon whose shoulders lay the responsibility to support his government, either by his own blood or by his money in the form of taxes, was entitled to representation in the body that levied those taxes upon him and compelled him to pay them.

Therefore, Mr. President, the language of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power of exclusive legislation must have included the power of taxation, because taxation is legislation, and has always been recognized, not only in our country but in the world at large, as the exercise of legislative power. Not only is it recognized as legislation on the part of the National Government, but in every State constitution in the 48 States of the American Union the right to levy and collect taxes is an exclusive right which is conferred upon the legislature of the State, and in no State constitution with which I am familiar is there any authority given to lay and collect taxes, to raise or lower income taxes or property taxes, by even so much as a penny, that may come out of the pockets of the people of that Commonwealth.

Then the able Senator from Kentucky went on to expand on the subject. He said:

What kind of taxation does this power relate to? The Constitution does not specify or limit. It does not attempt to segregate the different methods of taxation. Therefore, it must include all forms of taxes which can be levied.

It includes not only tariff duties, but income taxes and all other forms of taxation which the Federal Government may levy and collect to raise revenues for its support.

Taking the background of Anglo-Saxon history, the cause of the Revolution itself, which was the claim of the mother country that it had the right to tax Americans without their consent, we cannot believe that this provision or any provision of the Constitution was intended or contemplated that taxes could be levied by any other authority than the Congress of the people, chosen by them, responsible to them, and subject to be removed by them at frequent elections.

President Hoover must have had in mind this background when, on October 15, 1928, in the city of Boston, he uttered this sentiment:

"The Tariff Commission is a most valuable arm of the Government. It can be strengthened and made more useful in several ways. But the American people will never consent to delegating authority over the tariff to any commission, whether nonpartisan or bipartisan. Our people have the right to express themselves at the ballot on so vital a question as this.

"There is only one commission to which delegation of that authority can be made. That is the great commission of their own choosing, the Congress of the United States and the President. It is the only commission which can be held responsible to the electorate."

And so forth. What did the President have in mind when he used that language? Did he have in mind possible action by either of these agencies without the cooperation of the other? His language admits no such interpretation. He meant the orderly process under the Constitution of enactment by both Houses of Congress and the approval of the President, both of which are required to complete an act of legislation.

Not only did the framers of the Constitution confer the exclusive power upon Congress to levy and collect taxes, but they limited the power to initiate such taxation. In section 7 of article I it is provided that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

Why was this limitation placed in the Constitution? Because the framers were so determined to retain in the hands of the people power over their purse that they were not willing for any other branch or subdivision of the Government to start the processes of taxation except that branch which was directly responsible to them, which could be punished or rewarded for their course in all matters of taxation and expenditure.

Under the Constitution the Senate, even though now Senators are elected by the people and are responsible to them, cannot originate a tax bill. It cannot originate a measure laying one dollar in taxes upon the American people. Yet we are seriously asked to delegate to the President a power which we do not ourselves possess.

For you may gloss it over by any language that suits your fancy, when the President by an Executive order increases the taxes which must be paid by the American people, he originates a measure for raising revenue, a thing which the Senate of the United States cannot do.

We are told that this delegation of legislative authority is wise and proper, because it is limited in scope; that the President can only raise or reduce rates of tariff taxation to the extent of 50 percent of the rates fixed by Congress.

But if it is constitutional and wise to permit him to undo the work of Congress to the extent of 50 percent, why not give him full sweep of power to fix all rates, to reduce them or increase them according to his inclinations?

Why deny to unprotected, and maybe helpless, industries any relief whatever under this benign arrangement, when it may be that those which Congress has neglected need assistance more than those who have received a portion of what they demand? If we can abdicate a portion of the exclusive constitutional power with which Congress was invested by the forefathers, why stop at a portion? Why not let Congress relieve itself of all the burdens of drudgery in matters of taxation and turn it over to the Executive?

And if we have the power, and it is wise, to abdicate our constitutional responsibility in the levying of tariff duties in the way of taxation for raising revenue, why not abdicate it with reference to all forms of taxation?

If the Executive is more prompt and more wise in changing rates of tariff taxation, why is he less prompt and less wise in the matter of changing rates of income taxes?

We are told that there will be a surplus in the Treasury at the end of the year that will justify another reduction in taxes.

Then why waste the time and the money of the people by holding or prolonging a session of Congress to reduce the income taxes? Why not delegate to the President the power to reduce income-tax rates so as to absorb the expected surplus? And if this would be wise and proper, why not also clothe him with power to raise income-tax rates when there is an approaching deficit in the Treasury?

The exclusive power to levy taxes is exclusive as to all forms of taxation; and if we can delegate a part of it as to one form of taxation, we can delegate a portion or all of it as to all forms of taxation.

There is no analogy between the power of taxation as exercised by the President under the flexible provisions and the power of Congress to regulate railroad rates through the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In the first place, the Constitution does not say that "all bills for regulating commerce shall originate in the House of Representatives." That limitation applies only to bills raising revenue.

But Congress has never delegated to the President any power whatever in the regulation of commerce by the fixing of railroad rates. Congress established the Interstate Commerce Commission as an agency of Congress, and not of the Executive, for the purpose of carrying out the laws enacted by Congress for the regulation of railroad rates and practices. The President plays no part in the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He cannot change a single rate on any railroad in the United States either before or after determination by the Interstate Commerce Commission. He cannot receive its proceedings or nullify its orders. He cannot expand or contract its activities or its powers. This Commission is the creature of Congress, and it does not consult nor is it responsible to the President in the true conception of its functions.

Therefore, the creation of this Commission and the functions and powers with which Congress has clothed it offers no parallel for the proposal here to surrender the duty and obligation which the Constitution lays upon Congress alone—that of levying the taxes which the American people must pay for the support of their Government.

Not only did the framers of the Constitution propose to hold Congress responsible to the people for the amount of revenue raised for the Government, and the manner of its assessment and collection, but they also proposed to hold Congress responsible for its expenditure. For in article I, section 8, of the Constitution, in the enumeration of its powers, it is provided that Congress shall have power "To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years."

Would any person contend that Congress could delegate to the President or to any other agency the power to extend an appropriation for the Army for a longer period than 2 years?

In paragraph 7 of section 9, article I, the Constitution says: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law," and so forth. Would it be seriously contended that Congress could delegate to the President or any other agency the power to draw money from the Treasury without the passage of a law providing for its expenditure?

Congress cannot abdicate its authority over the money in the National Treasury, and it cannot properly do it with reference to the collection of that money in the form of taxes.

But we are told by some of the advocates of this congressional surrender that Congress is slothful, slow of action, and cannot act with that precision and foresight which is necessary to those who are in a hurry.

We are told that Congress is possessed of nothing but incapacity; that it cannot obtain the facts upon which tariff legislation should be based; that it engages in logrolling and back scratching, as a result of which unjust and indefensible rates are inflicted upon the people; that it can only revise the tariff once in many years; and that somebody else ought to have the power to revise it piecemeal during these congressional lapses into innocuous desuetude.

We have heard dignified and venerable Senators, who are suspected of a desire to be returned here, denounce both branches of Congress in terms which make it difficult to understand why they would want to remain in such company.

We are told that Congress can only engage in tariff revision at long intervals, and that even if it desires or is capable of dealing with limited articles, it cannot do so because of delays and the inclusion of other articles.

This has not been the history of Congress. It is true that a general revision of all the schedules generally requires several months. But it has required several years for the Tariff Commission to investigate single items and report them to the President under the flexible provisions of the present law. I say this not in criticism, but merely as the statement of a fact.

But Congress has on numerous occasions dealt with a limited number of schedules or even items in matters of tariff rates and has been able to produce legislative results with promptness and certainty.

In the Sixty-seventh Congress, a tariff bill (H. R. 2435, emergency tariff) was on—

April 12, 1921, introduced in the House.
April 14, reported from committee.
April 15, passed by the House.

These are but a few instances to confound those who put forth the spurious claim that Congress cannot be relied upon to act with promptness and effectiveness even in the passage of tariff bills when the circumstances justify prompt and effective action.

Those who seek this unwise departure are not actuated by the fear that Congress will not act. They desire to take the enactment of tariff legislation away from the representatives of the people, away from public discussion, away from the view of the people to the quiet precincts of secrecy where the people who have to bear the burden and pay the tribute will not know what is happening to them until it is too late to protest.

* * * * * * *

What I am attempting to do is to show that whenever Congress is confronted with a necessity, with an emergency, with the facts before it as to a limited number of items, it can act more promptly and more efficiently than can the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. President, I do not deal with this subject from the standpoint alone of the taxing power being exclusive in Congress. However, from whichever standpoint we may view this subject, we must say that Congress must pause in the avenue which it is now traveling, and by which we are tearing down the organic law.

First of all, it is a tax measure. Being a tax measure, it belongs in Congress; Congress alone should deal with it. Secondly, being a tax measure, one which Congress exclusively should deal with then, more emphatically than ever, so-called trade agreements should be transmitted to the Senate of the United States, and the Senate should exercise its prerogative and power, not only its prerogative and power but its duty, imposed upon it by the Constitution, to ratify or reject treaties.

Oh, it will not do to stand here and say these are not treaties; that they are merely agreements between nations. What is a treaty unless it be an agreement between one independent nation and another independent nation? Where is the twilight zone of differentiation between an agreement that affects the hearthstone of every taxpayer and every man, woman, and child in America, and an agreement that affects only a portion of the National Government? I ask, Where is the twilight zone of differentiation? Well, it does not exist. That is the story.

It is said that those favoring the policy do not dare bring reciprocal trade agreements back to the Senate of the United States for ratification because there would be logrolling. Logrolling! I wonder if there is any logrolling going on now. I wonder where the logs are. I wonder how far they are rolling. Logrolling is charged in the effort to continue a policy that is violative of the plainest and most emphatic provision of the organic law. Logrolling is suggested in order to put through the Congress the renewal or extension of a law which every country of the Western Hemisphere that has had dealings with this country in the negotiation of trade agreements has laughed at; for they have submitted trade agreements to their legislative bodies, while we, the leading republic of the world, holding our Constitution aloft as a precept and guide for other peoples of the world, are made aware of the fact that those who sponsor this program are afraid to come back to the Congress, to one body of the Congress, composed of 96 men, and have them consider it because there would be logrolling.

Is it not time for us to forget about logrolling? Is it not time for us to remember the oath we all took to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States, and, defending the Constitution of the United States, to remember that those who bear the brunt of government, those who bear the burdens of government, those who sustain the Government, are those who pay the taxes; and those who pay the taxes look to us, their representatives; and, looking to us, they look through us to the organic law that speaks more emphatically than all the reciprocal trade agreements in the world?

Mr. President, I might deal with this question from many angles. The whole reciprocity trade-agreement policy has done exactly what was predicted it would do. Those predictions came from the lips of leading men on the floor of the Senate when the very principle, though less offensive by far to constitutional provisions than that underlying the present reciprocal trade-agreement act, was under consideration. I refer to the flexible-tariff clause of the Smoot-Hawley bill, and the flexible-tariff clause of the bill which preceded the Smoot-Hawley bill. When those measures were before the Congress it was stated, first, that they were unconstitutional; secondly, that they constituted a delegation of legislative power by the legislature to the executive department; and, thirdly, that, from both angles, they were violative of the spirit and intendment of the organic law.

I do not care how this proposal may be dressed; I do not care what clothing may be placed around it; I do not care with what swaddling clothes it may be enwrapped, it is only another baby, another attempt to destroy the respect which the people of America have for their organic law. The more we destroy that respect, the more those of us who have taken an oath to sustain the organic law permit the impression to prevail in the minds of the people of the country that we have no respect for it; and the more we tear down our form of government, which some years ago looked as though God Himself had ordained it, yea, more, which in this very hour, holding itself aloof from foreign entanglements, with the everlasting hope that by our precept and our example we may prove to the peoples of the world that democracy is a success, and, being a success, they can afford to follow our course.

Mr. President, if we continue to tear down, to chip away from the block of constitutional security, session by session, time by time, hour by hour, the day will come, if we live long enough, when we, as individuals and as a body, will regret and rue it, not because of its effect upon us individually, but because of its effect upon our country to which our boys and girls must look as security for their lives in the centuries to come.

Let us pause before it is too late. Let us pause because in pausing we may emphasize that the Senate of the United States, after all, does mean something. It does mean something to be a Senator of the United States; it does mean something to represent a constituency in the greatest deliberative body in the world, in the upper House, so-called, of the Congress of the United States, and that meaning is that we will never again pass a law to take from the Constitution the very essence and spirit that was inculcated into that memorable and, I hope, everlasting document.

Mr. President, I have gone perhaps too much at length into this question. Perhaps it is because I am wrapped up in the subject. I wish now to return to the thought I expressed in the beginning of my humble remarks today. I desire to recur to that thought, because I think it emphatically important, and that is unless we stop somewhere, the result will be as has been predicted that democracy itself will prove a failure; that we cannot depend on the democracies; we cannot depend upon the masses of the people to legislate for themselves.

Unless we pause somewhere, and stop this everlasting drift toward nonconstitutional action, we will find ourselves without a Constitution or a Nation. We will find ourselves so weakened in the estimation of the people who constitute the sovereigns of this Government that some one will take over the entire affairs of government and lead us out of the labyrinth of delegated authority that the Congress did not seem to have the courage to avoid.

Mr. President, this is an appeal from those of us who believe in the organic law. This is an appeal from those of us who would give our lives to sustain the organic law. This is an appeal from those of us who, trained in the law, believe in the law, and believing in the law, are willing even to sacrifice everything we have to the end that this continuous process of tearing down the law shall not proceed further; that it shall somewhere be stopped. Now is the time to stop it in connection with a measure which so greatly impinges on those who need protection, the masses of the people, who constitute the sovereign power of the Nation and from whom some would like to take sovereignty away.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, with the names attached, a statement signed by 600 prominent leaders in the fields of education, agriculture, industry, religion, and public affairs, urging the continuation of the reciprocal trade agreements program. With my colleagues on the Finance Committee, I was presented this petition a few moments ago by a delegation representing the American Union for Concerted Peace Efforts, headed by Mr. Frederick McKee, of Pittsburgh, Pa. Those who signed this statement are representative of all political parties and various kinds of interests.

There being no objection, the statement, with the names attached thereto, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

The people of the United States deplore the current wars and look anxiously for their termination. How can they help to remove the causes of war and help build permanent peace, so that these terrible calamities will not keep recurring?

We, the undersigned, believe there is at hand at least one practical way in which the United States can contribute to the removal of the economic causes of war and can keep open the channels of international trade against the day when the war will be over and the gigantic problems of economic reconstruction will be before us. That way lies through continuance of the reciprocal-trade agreements program.

Amid all the international economic insanity of the past years, the trade agreements have marked one sane effort to keep open that flow of international trade so essential to peace. They have been a rallying point for all those who realize that economic disarmament and political disarmament are two aspects of the same problem. For the United States now to repudiate the outstanding effort it has made in the direction of peaceful and orderly economic relations would be one more victory for the dark forces of violence and greed.

Even more important today is the fact that the longer the war lasts the greater will be the economic exhaustion of the participants, the greater will be the need of sound economic foundations upon which to build a new world of law and order.

To continue the trade agreements program will improve the chances for a peace that will not carry with it the seeds of fresh trade rivalries and antogonisms. The choice before us is whether we shall turn back to the old exclusiveness of economic nationalism or shall lead in showing the way to that economic freedom, without which political freedom is impossible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, incomparably the greatest issue before this Nation and before the world is the question whether or not democratic government shall continue to exist. If it were not for my deep feeling that this is an issue upon which we in this Chamber are about to pass, I should not trespass upon the time of the Senate.

It must be obvious to every person who gives consideration to what is happening in the world that the permanency of popular government as we know it in the United States is now actually in the balance. Within 2 weeks the dictator of one great empire in Central Europe had a conference with another dictator in a pass of the Alps, as a result of which word has gone forth that these two dictators are endeavoring now to invite into conference and agreement with them a dictator who controls the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The curious thing which must arouse the fear, I might say, of every American citizen and every other person who believes in democracy is that these three dictators represent absolutely different points of view. Mr. Hitler, who directs not only the policies of the German Reich but what the people of Germany may do, was placed in power because the people who were possessed of property and of wealth feared that they were going to lose their property and wealth to a rising movement of bolshevism.

So Mr. Hitler represents those who are the possessors of property, and under him the German Republic, established after the war, was wiped out, and every form of personal liberty and, indeed, every single principle which is sacred to those who believe in the American Republic, were likewise abolished within the confines of Germany.

Across the boundary line in Russia, where Joseph Stalin is the dictator, we find a regime which is based upon the fears of the dispossessed and those who did not have any property. In that country there was frankly set up what was called a dictatorship of the proletariat, a dictatorship which is opposed not only to the forms of democracy but also to all those canons of religious thought to which Christian peoples for almost 2,000 years have been devoted.

In Italy the third of these dictators is the head of a great people, who believe in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.

So we have a combination of three men, representing, as I have said, the reverse of all the principles and ideals for which America has stood, who are undertaking to dominate the lives of all the inhabitants of Europe.

Across the Pacific Ocean, in the other hemisphere, we find a similar movement in progress, and the Republic of China, established within our time, is being crushed by a military power.

We like to believe that we in the United States want to see the democratic principle preserved and defended. We like to believe that we want to see the democratic principle prevail. It was because of that fundamental belief in the minds and hearts of our people—and I am speaking frankly—that Congress within a very short time, in the extraordinary session last year, amended the Neutrality Act, for purposes which were perfectly apparent at that time.

Yet we are here today discussing a measure which, as demonstrated by the unanswerable argument of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] yesterday, and the equally unanswerable argument of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] today, strikes at the very root of our constitutional form of government. So the people of America, who believe in democracy, who want to see democracy prevail throughout the world, are asked to carry their beliefs into action by abandoning the democratic principle.

Mr. President, it seemed to me a very tragic circumstance that when the senior Senator from Nevada spoke yesterday and when the junior Senator from Nevada spoke today it was scarcely possible at any time to marshal more than 20 Senators on the floor to listen to the arguments. It is perfectly obvious that those who are in charge of the joint resolution who absent themselves from the floor have undertaken to carry this measure by a policy of silence. No effort was made to reply to the Senators from Nevada yesterday or today. No effort was made by those who are defending the joint resolution to develop the argument or to oppose the arguments which were presented. It seems to me that the reason is obvious. These arguments are, as I stated a moment ago, unanswerable.

I rise now only for the purpose, as I have said, of putting myself on record in order that there may be no question that in this critical period of world history I am standing upon this floor for the maintenance of the democratic process and constitutional procedure.

At the beginning of the discussion this afternoon I wish to read into the RECORD certain provisions of the Constitution of the United States upon which I believe this argument turns. I shall then ask that there be printed in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks the full text of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, approved June 12, 1934.

The first part of the Constitution to which I desire to call attention, which is section 1 of article I, reads as follows:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Next I read section 3 of article I:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State * * *.

The third provision to which I desire to call attention is section 7 of article I, the first sentence:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Then comes the clause of the Constitution which deals with treaties. This is to be found in section 1 of article II, dealing with the powers of the President:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they deem proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Finally, the second paragraph of article 6 reads:

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Referring to the article just read, which provides that—

All treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land—

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that a trade agreement is a treaty, is it not made under the authority of the United States?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator agree that a trade agreement is a treaty?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; but assuming it is a treaty, does not the section the Senator just read authorize the making of a treaty in the way provided, without the consent of the Senate, merely by the Secretary of State, if it is under the authority of the United States? Trade agreements are made under the authority of the United States, by action of the Congress, and with the approval of the President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the authority of the United States to make treaties is to be found in the Constitution of the United States and nowhere else. That power, by a provision which I read just a moment ago, is specifically delegated to the President and to the Senate. The making of a treaty is not a legislative act; it is an Executive act—an Executive act in which the Senate participates with the President. An agreement which does not obtain ratification by the Senate is not a treaty and is not the supreme law of the land. Have I touched the matter to which the Senator called attention?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has made an assertion.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was endeavoring to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I take it to be the Senator's viewpoint that although the agreements are made under the authority of the United States, in pursuance of law duly enacted, still the Senator contends they are not valid because they are not made in some other way.

Of course, I recognize that that is the Senator's argument, but I think it is totally unsound.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator certainly misapprehends the language of the Constitution. If I understand him correctly, his contention is that the second paragraph of article VI should read in some such manner as this——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, whether by ratification on the part of the Senate or not, shall be the supreme law of the land."

Mr. President, I believe that there is no possibility by any system of argument, of logic, or of precedent, so to amend the Constitution, and the Senator's point of view could not be upheld by any other process of interpretation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, was on his feet. I should like very much to invite his comment upon this matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Wyoming, and I think he practically answered the Senator from Alabama as I intended to answer him. The Constitution is part of the law of the land; and therefore, when it is said that something may be done according to law, or under the laws of the land, that refers back to the Constitution as the primary law of the land, which states exactly how laws may be put into effect.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Alabama prompts me to make another comment, which I had not intended to make at this time, about the manner in which the interpretation of our Constitution and our laws is stretched from time to time in order to accomplish a purpose we may have legislatively in mind.

I think it altogether impossible that any such interpretation as that suggested by the Senator from Alabama could be adopted. It seems to me it is on all fours with another suggestion, if such a suggestion could be made, with respect to the matter in which confirmation of appointive officers is made by the Senate. In the second paragraph of section 2 of article II, which I read a moment ago, giving the President the power to make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, there is incorporated the power of the President to nominate judges of the Supreme Court, who shall take office upon confirmation by the Senate. Those who are asking the Senate to place the seal of its approval upon this extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act are asking us, as the Senator from Alabama apparently did a moment ago, to consider that a trade agreement which does not have a ratification shall be regarded as a treaty, as though it had been ratified.

Can the power to make treaties without ratification be granted to the President? If it cannot, then what argument possibly could be made for the passage of a law stripping the Senate of its responsibility and its duty to confirm Justices of the Supreme Court? If we can shed our power and responsibility, nay, our duty in the one case, then certainly, Mr. President, we can shed it in the other case. Both are contained in the same sentence of the fundamental law of the land.

Someone ought to write an article or deliver a speech upon the progressive degeneration of the democratic principle, as exemplified by the history of this legislation, and by the history of the attempt which has been made during a long period of years to delegate to the Executive functions and powers and duties which the Constitution has vested in the Congress of the United States.

Attention has been called, with reference to the trade-agreement law, to the fact that in 1890 Congress passed the McKinley Tariff Act, and that in that act, in order to enable the President to carry out certain reciprocal agreements with certain countries, section 3 was written, providing that five particular commodities should be placed upon the free list.

The section then authorized the President to determine as a fact whether or not the countries exporting those five commodities were engaged in unfair discrimination against the United States, and upon a finding by the President to that effect he might issue a proclamation as a result of which certain specific duties named in the act should become effective.

In the McKinley Act, therefore, Congress named five particular commodities and named five particular schedules of customs duties. It committed to the President only the power and responsibility of finding out as a fact whether or not discrimination was practiced by the nations from which those five commodities came. There was no delegation of legislative power. The power to name commodities and to fix rates is a legislative power, and Congress exercised that legislative power in that act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's remarks, but I should like to have his position made clear. Is it the Senator's position that there is any difference whatever, in a legal and constitutional sense, between Congress granting the Executive authority as to 5 commodities, and Congress granting the Executive authority as to 50 commodities, or as to all commodities on the dutiable list?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator's question is not complete. If the Senator would add, "Provided that in the same grant Congress itself specifically fixes the duties," I should say there is no difference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator answer the question I asked him because he emphasized the fact, not only today but before the Finance Committee—and he always emphasizes the fact—that in the act of 1890 the provision to which he refers was limited to 5 commodities. In the Senator's opinion, is it of any importance whatever whether the provision, which is a separate proposition fixing the rate, should apply to 5 commodities, or to 50 commodities, or to 500 commodities, or to all commodities?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the significant fact is not the number of commodities. The significant fact is the duty on those commodities and how that duty is fixed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a different proposition, which I shall be glad to discuss in my own time, later; but I simply wanted to fix the Senator's position, because he has not only emphasized it today but has previously emphasized it, that the act of 1890 provided for five commodities, and I wanted to find out whether the Senator attaches the slightest importance, from a legal and constitutional point of view, to the number of commodities involved; in other words, whether it is a question of principle or a question of commodities.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the argument here is based upon the fixing of customs duties, and upon nothing else. That is the significant and the important delegation of power which is granted by the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

Congress having done that in 1890, a question arose with respect to the constitutionality of the particular section 3, which was passed upon by the Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark, to which both Senators from Nevada have alluded. It is sufficient for the purposes of this discussion for me to read the following sentence from the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Field against Clark:

> The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular case under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle.

Namely, the principle that Congress cannot delegate legislative power. The Supreme Court continues:

> It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. Congress itself prescribed, in advance, the duties to be levied * * * on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasts. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President.

So the point in Field against Clark was clearly that Congress, having left nothing to the discretion of the President, and having named the commodities and fixed the rates, had not violated the rule against the delegation of power.

Seven years passed. A new Congress was sitting and a new tariff bill was to be written. This was the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897. Congress again followed the precedent of section 3 of the McKinley Act, and again gave the President power, upon the finding of a fact, to fix by proclamation the duties which Congress itself had named. But, desiring to provide for bargaining between the United States and foreign countries with respect to tariff rates—in other words, desiring to establish a policy of reciprocity by which the Executive should undertake to negotiate with foreign countries and reach some sort of an agreement upon reciprocal customs duties to be made effective—the Congress wrote into that act section 4.

Mr. President, the significant thing about section 4 is that there for the first time Congress enacted a law providing for reciprocal-trade treaties; and Congress, jealous of the power of the Senate to ratify treaties, jealous of the power of the House to originate revenue laws, provided that such treaties must have the advice and consent of the Senate, and then must be passed upon by Congress in an act originating in the House of Representatives.

What was the significance of that provision? Clearly, in 1897, the Congress believed that a reciprocal-trade treaty was indeed a treaty, and that a law fixing customs duties was a revenue law, which must originate in the House.

It may be of interest to the Senate to scan for just a moment a brief portion of the debates upon the act of 1897. I wish to refer to the remarks of a distinguished Democratic Senator from California, Hon. Stephen M. White. At this point, Mr. President, let me say that all through the history of tariff legislation the Democratic Members of the Senate have been arrayed in exactly the same position as that now occupied by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and myself. In every single instance in the history of tariff legislation, down to the enactment of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the Democratic Members of this body, whether they were in the majority or in the minority, stood fast for the power of the Senate to ratify treaties and the power of the House to originate measures affecting customs duties.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's remarks. If he prefers that I wait until the conclusion of his remarks, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I always enjoy the interruptions of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Wyoming did not entertain any such view in 1937, when this very question was before the Senate, did he?

I have very great respect for the Senator's constitutional views. I recognize that anyone has a right to change his constitutional or legal views at any time he sees fit. However, when the Senator makes the statement that it is the unbroken precedent of Democratic Senators to stand for the view he has just expressed, in favor of ratification, I have in mind on this particular question, with regard to this particular act, an expression by a very eminent constitutional authority, namely, Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, with respect to which he and I have exchanged views before the Finance Committee.

With the permission of the Senator from Wyoming, I shall be glad to insert that expression in the RECORD at this point, in order that the Senator may adequately dispose of that question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, on February 25, 1937, when a measure almost identical in words and figures with the present one—namely, an extension of the act of 1934—was before this body, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], for whose views I have the greatest respect, and whom I was glad to follow on that occasion, said:

> Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if there had been a roll call upon the amendment offered a few moments ago by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] requiring ratification of the trade agreements entered into under the authority of this measure by a two-thirds vote, I should have voted against the proposal, and I desire the RECORD to show that I was opposed to it.

Mr. President, on that occasion not even a sufficient number of the Members of this body thought the measure required ratification, or was unconstitutional without ratification, to demand a yea-and-nay vote, which under the Constitution may be obtained on demand of one-fifth of the Senators present.

> I agree with the arguments which have been offered here that any requirement of ratification would have made it altogether impossible to hope for any successful development of the program of reciprocal agreements.

The Constitution has not changed since 1937; the act has not changed since 1937. Assuming—as I know to be the fact—that in 1937 the Senator from Wyoming would not have voted for an act which he thought to be plainly unconstitutional upon its face, or against an amendment which as he says, required what the Constitution requires, I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming what has happened since 1937 to change his views?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, nothing in the world has happened; and I stand today on exactly the same ground I then held. Apparently I was altogether inept, and probably a little obscure, in presenting my argument to the Finance Committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Wyoming is never inept or obscure. He was very apt and very plain, very clear thinking and very clear spoken on the occasion of the expression which I have just quoted.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator from Missouri for the compliment. I am glad to accept it. However, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that when I made that statement upon the floor of the Senate in 1937 I was asking the Congress to give to the House of Representatives and to the Senate of the United States the power to pass upon customs duties.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall answer the Senator now. Let him wait a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to wait.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, when I appeared before the Finance Committee, presided over by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I presented to that committee, not the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] requiring ratification—not at all. I presented the amendment which lies upon the desk, requiring that trade treaties shall not become effective unless and until approved by affirmative action of the Congress.

Now I shall tell the Senator why, and I think it is very clear. I recognize the fact that in many instances ratification would make it practically impossible to secure approval of trade agreements. Very true. However, on two separate occasions—in 1934 and again in 1937—I offered an amendment designed to protect the right of Congress—the representatives of the people—to pass upon the rates. My amendment was defeated. This year I went before the Committee on Finance and presented that amendment in the fond but disappointed hope that a committee in which Democrats have the majority would preserve the revenue-making power of the Congress.

I offered the amendment, but the committee reported the measure without the amendment.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri leaves me no alternative but to vote for ratification, because apparently it is the only way in which I can preserve the democratic principle; and I shall do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, I fully recognize that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming is a different amendment from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I very well understand the parliamentary situation with respect to both amendments. If one amendment is voted down, we shall have a vote on the other amendment. However, the reason why I ask the question of the Senator from Wyoming is that both today on the floor and in his appearance before the Finance Committee the Senator from Wyoming made an argument leading to the conclusion that under the Constitution of the United States trade agreements are treaties, and that, therefore—whether or not Congress so intended in the act—under the Constitution of the United States they require ratification by the Senate. I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether or not that is his position; whether he believes that these agreements are treaties and that they do, under the Constitution of the United States, require ratification by the Senate, as was maintained by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] yesterday?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very glad the Senator interrupted me again, because I had omitted that part of the answer to his original question.

The problem is very clear; the proposition is very explicit. If the President negotiates an agreement with any foreign country which, like the agreement with Colombia to which the distinguished Senator from Michigan has called attention or the agreement with Belgium, to which the distinguished junior Senator from Nevada has called attention, undertakes to modify an existing treaty, then, such an agreement is a treaty, and should be regarded as such and ratified as such.

When I made the statement in 1937, it never occurred to me, in my wildest imagination, that the State Department would undertake, in the guise of negotiating a trade agreement, to modify a treaty which had been ratified by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me answer the Senator. The Senator is a little precipitate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thought the Senator had concluded. I did not intend to try to rush the Senator from Wyoming in any degree whatever, particularly when he has the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, if the President of the United States negotiates with another country a trade agreement which is merely a trade agreement which deals solely with customs duties, then, we may consider the fact that in presenting such an agreement to the Congress the President is recommending to the Congress the exercise of its legislative power to amend a tariff law, and such amendment can be made and the duties proposed can be put into effect without the necessity of ratification by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him further, let me say that I think he will read the amendment of the Senator from Nevada for a long time and with very great care without finding any such restrictions and provisions as the Senator from Wyoming has put into it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I cannot be held responsible for what the Senator from Nevada does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree entirely with that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is chiding me upon my position. Now let us hold to my position. My position is clear. I have always believed that if the Congress of the United States, by a majority vote in both Houses, passes a law changing the customs duties as recommended by the President in a trade agreement, that is a sufficient compliance with the Constitution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, Mr. President, so far as I know, and so far as I have been familiar with all the discussions and all the debates on this subject from time immemorial, I never heard anybody even suggest for one moment that Congress did not have at any time it saw fit the right to pass a tariff act, which would become a law when signed by the President, as soon as he signed it. That is the proposition last stated by the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I did not intimate that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator is knocking down a straw man which nobody ever set up. The Senator says it is his position that if Congress sees fit to go ahead and pass a specific tariff act in specific accordance with the terms of a tariff agreement, that would become a law. Everybody agrees with that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is too fair a debater to put words in my mouth.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is precisely the position of the Senator, as I understand it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; not at all. I have stated that my amendment says that if a trade agreement is approved by Congress it shall become a law; or, put in the other way, which is the correct way—that no trade agreement negotiated by the President shall become effective until approved by the affirmative act of Congress. That, Mr. President, is the historic position of the Congress of the United States down to the moment when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have been trying to find out whether it was the position of the Senator in connection with the pending amendment that ratification by the Senate is necessary. I asked the question in all good faith, because, as I understood the position of the Senator when he was appearing before the Finance Committee, and if I understood his position correctly today, it was that trade agreements are treaties which require ratification by the Senate, but that, nevertheless, he would be satisfied with the lesser proposition contained in his amendment. Mr. President, if they are treaties and ratification is required by the Constitution, what right has the Senator from Wyoming or the Senator from Mississippi or the Congress as a whole to be satisfied with anything less? If they are treaties and ratification is required, then the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming would be as unconstitutional as anything else, whether the Senator was satisfied with it or not.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I quite agree with the Senator from Missouri now, because I have been educated by the State Department to understand that it does not regard trade agreements as mere agreements; it regards them as treaties and it has so declared, and has so acted. It has modified treaties. So, Mr. President, I have been driven from the position which I occupied, but it was my belief that in the trade agreements we would be dealing solely with customs duties. Now I have been taught to know that we are dealing with treaties as well, and are modifying treaties. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will bring before the Senate a list of the treaties of the United States which have been modified in any way, shape, or form by the 22 trade agreements which so far have been negotiated.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Did I understand the Senator to say the reason why he presented his amendment, which differs from the ratification amendment, was that he had no idea that the Colombian agreement would go so far or that the Belgian agreement would go so far?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; I say that the reason I am supporting the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is that I now know that the State Department is going that far.

Mr. HARRISON. Did not the Senator know in 1937, when he made those remarks, that the Colombian agreement had been negotiated?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I did not know its contents.

Mr. HARRISON. It had been negotiated in 1936, and the Senator from Michigan had grown very eloquent in his opposition to the continuation of the trade-agreements program, pointing out the Colombian agreement specifically.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That was one of the arguments which missed me at the time; but certainly my position is now clear, and I hope the Senator from Mississippi will furnish a list of the treaties ratified by this body which have been changed or attempted to be changed by trade agreements.

But I was discussing the progressive degeneration of the democratic principle. I pointed out the act of 1890, with its grant of power to the President to find facts, and then, upon the finding of facts, to have the customs duties fixed by Congress go into effect. Then I pointed out that that provision of the act of 1890 was upheld by the Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark, and that in that opinion the Supreme Court specifically declared that it was supporting the constitutionality of the act on the ground that it did not convey to the President any discretion or any power to determine policy or any power to select commodities or any power to fix customs duties. So in 1897, 7 years afterward, the Congress of the United States, with that decision upon the books of the Supreme Court, desiring to put into effect the policy of reciprocity, did not regard the precedent of Field against Clark as sufficient to support and justify a program of such breadth, involving negotiation and bargaining with foreign nations, survey of the entire list of commodities in which the trade of the United States is carried on, and fixing rates within limitations set by the Congress at the will and discretion of the President. Because it did not regard Field against Clark as a precedent, the Congress of the United States wrote section 4 of the Dingley Act. That was a declaration by the legislative body of the United States of its belief in constitutional principle, and certainly a declaration that the decision in the case of Field against Clark had not amended the Constitution of the United States. But now, Mr. President, we are told by every person who attempts to argue the constitutionality of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act that Field against Clark pointed the way. The Congress did not believe that.

In 1922 the story began again. In 1922 was passed the Fordney-McCumber Act. Before I reach that act, however, I desire to read just a small portion of the debate of 1897, because it so aptly and clearly illustrates the point I have been making about these two laws.

Senator White, of California, a very able Democrat, was discussing section 4 of the Dingley Act. He said:

> This is a wonderful affair. I attempted to point out some time ago that we have no power to delegate to the President, as the primary attempt here indicated was the intention of the other side—

He says "the primary attempt" because section 4 of that act, as originally proposed, did not contain the phrase "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so Senator White says "primary attempt"— > to confer the authority to fix tariff rates below 20 percent or below anything else; that while the Supreme Court had decided that the President, upon the happening of a certain event, might call into activity a provision of Congress providing that when he found a specific fact the act should go into effect, nevertheless he had no authority to exercise any function as to fixing tariff rates, that being wholly a subject for the determination of Congress.

> To obviate to some extent that objection the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" were inserted. I pointed out that if we had the authority under the treaty-making power granted by the Constitution to fix tariff rates, as we have done sometimes—a bad policy I conceded and concede—we did not need any attempted legislative grant; that the Constitution gave us such treaty-making power as we possess, and that it could never be subtracted from or added to by any declaration of Congress.
> * * * * * * *
> Congress has power—

He said—

> to legislate so that tonka beans may be looked out for, and it has power to legislate so as to fix $6 or $8, as the case may be, per dozen upon quart bottles of champagne—

And so on, making the argument which was just made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]; to which this statement was made in response by Senator Allison:

> Just one moment. The Senator from California misapprehends the situation as to tonka beans and champagne and the other articles embraced in section 3.

Section 3, of course, was the section which named the commodities and named the rates, and gave the President only the power to find a fact with respect to discrimination.

> Under section 3 the President has the same power that he had under the legislation of 1890, without the intervention either of the Senate or of Congress. But the fourth section, which the Senator now criticizes so sharply, has certain merit. It is not convenient, if it were constitutional, for Congress formally to deal with the Government of France or the Government of Mexico or the government of any other country. We could not very well send a committee of Congress over to Europe and ask what they would do if we did something else.
> The President of the United States therefore having exclusively what is called the treaty-making power, or the initiation of this question, he is given the power in a limited way to do certain things; and when they are done, the treaty is sent to the Senate first for its ratification, and then to Congress for its approval.
> I see no great difficulty about it. Indeed I think it is a very useful and important provision. It may be limited to too short a period, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, but it is very easy to extend it during the next Congress if the scheme proves to be useful.

There, Mr. President, is the legislative history of the development of this principle.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the last procedure which the Senator has recited, how many agreements were made?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The so-called Kasson treaties were negotiated. They came to the Senate, but they were never ratified. I heard the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] on the floor of this body yesterday declare—and he spoke with knowledge—that such a storm of public disapproval arose with respect to those treaties that nobody dared to present them for ratification.

Mr. HARRISON. The Kasson agreements came out of the other provision the Senator read, which provided for ratification by the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Under section 4.

Mr. HARRISON. That is correct. Under the other provision the Argyle agreements, I think they were called, were entered into, which did not have to come back to the Senate for ratification.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. And in the case of the Argyle agreements, as to which no ratification was provided for, they all went into effect and became the law, and affected 5 different countries. Under the other provision, by the terms of which the agreements had to come back to the Senate for ratification, the 11 so-called Kasson agreements were made, and 1 additional, I think. At any rate, 11 came to the Senate, and rested here for 5 years, and none of them was ratified.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. None of them was even considered.

Mr. HARRISON. None was considered or ratified; and then Mr. McKinley, I think, did not submit the twelfth.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the Senator from Mississippi believe that if these agreements require ratification, the refusal of the Senate to ratify the treaties to which he refers is no legitimate argument?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not believe the agreements described in this joint resolution are treaties. The Senator from Nevada, and those who think as he does I will not say have propagandized, but they have put it in the minds of people to say treaties, when they ought to be called agreements. That is the way in which we differentiate in the matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the Senator know that the Supreme Court has stated that an agreement is a treaty if it is entered into with a foreign government for a specific length of time?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not accept the Senator's view on that subject at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall have to read to the Senator, later on, what the Supreme Court said; but what I am asking the Senator is this: His argument against the argument made by the Senator from Wyoming is that there was long delay on some treaties. What difference would that make, if we were following the Constitution?

Mr. HARRISON. I think we are following the Constitution in this instance.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the difference is that the Constitution is too cumbersome, and it is desired to shortcut it. Let me say that no Senator has yet risen upon this floor to make an argument upholding the constitutionality of this procedure. Every shred of argument which has been prepared as yet by the State Department has been torn asunder. There is not a line that can be upheld.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, the Senator from Wyoming has just changed his views, as was pointed out by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming has not changed his views. The Senator from Wyoming has found that the facts were different from what he had supposed them to be.

Mr. HARRISON. I take it that the Senator is opposed to the amendment which is now pending?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not at all, because, as I say, I have been taught by the supporters of this program that they do regard these instruments as treaties, and I must follow their lead in that respect and demand the constitutional procedure. We cannot have an agreement which changes a treaty unless the agreement itself is a treaty. It cannot be argued that an instrument of lesser dignity than a treaty may alter a treaty. The customs duties which are fixed in a law of Congress may be changed in only one of two ways: They may be changed by another law originating in the House of Representatives and approved by the Senate, or they may be changed by a treaty negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate. But when the Senator from Mississippi presents as his argument, as he did in the Finance Committee, the decision of Chief Justice Taney in which he clearly pointed out that a treaty deals with public welfare for a period of time, and an agreement deals with a specific act for a short time, there is no alternative for us but to follow the treaty-making power. If we want treaty powers, we must exercise those powers in the constitutional way.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it the Senator's contention that a treaty may be changed or nullified only by another treaty?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Or a law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or a law. Congress may modify or may nullify a treaty by an act of Congress?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. So, if this is a proper delegation of authority, and it is carried out by the executive branch, or whatever the agency of Congress may be, in pursuance of an act of Congress, may it not be as efficiently and as effectively done under the authority of Congress as if Congress itself enacted the law modifying the treaty?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; I answer in the affirmative. If Congress may delegate to the President the power to fix customs duties in the face of the distinct provision of the Constitution that all revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives, then, of course, it can be done; but that, of course, is the whole point of the argument which is being made—that the attempt is being made to take away from Congress the tax-levying power and vest it in the Executive.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, in that argument the Senator fails to distinguish between a tax law and a regulation of commerce, under the authority of Congress, through an agency set up by the Congress, does he not?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; I do not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I grant that a bill whose primary purpose is to levy taxes must originate in the House of Representatives, and we all understand that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator from Kentucky contend, then, that a bill which levies taxes, though the raising of revenue is not the primary purpose, may be made effective in any other way?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. For example, the corporate profits distribution tax, or whatever it was called, was levied, not for the purpose of raising revenue, but the bill was passed for the purpose of having the incomes of large corporations distributed among their stockholders. Would it have been possible for that bill to originate in the Senate?

Mr. BARKLEY. No, indeed. It may have been in the minds of some Members of Congress, and of some in executive departments who suggested such a tax, that it would result in the distribution of profits, but the primary object of the legislation was to collect revenue, to the same extent that it would have been collected if the profits had been distributed and the shareholders had paid income taxes upon those profits. So it cannot be said that the primary motive behind the legislation, whatever anyone may have thought of it as a matter of wisdom, was to secure the distribution of profits among shareholders.

Does the Senator distinguish between a bona fide revenue measure and one which is intended to prevent the interchange of articles of commerce among nations? For instance, if we were to pass a law levying rates so high as to prohibit absolutely the importation of any articles into the United States, would the Senator construe that to be a revenue measure, or a regulation of our commerce?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In my opinion, such a measure would have to originate in the House of Representatives, just as the distribution tax did, just as every protective tariff law has. The protective tariff laws were never regarded as revenue-raising measures. The protective tariff laws, from the time they were first suggested by Alexander Hamilton, were intended for the purpose of encouraging the industrial development of the United States, and not for the purpose of raising revenue, and for 150 years they originated in the House of Representatives. That was so strongly the conviction of those who are sponsoring the pending measure that they were careful, in 1934, to have the bill originate in the House; they were careful in 1937 to have the continuing resolution originate in the House, and they were careful to have the pending continuing resolution originate in the House, because they were seeking by that device to meet the constitutional requirement that revenue-raising measures must be initiated there.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no inconsistency between the fact that the original Trade Agreements Act originated in the House and that the two continuing resolutions originated in the House, because so long as a measure raises revenue, even in theory, though as a matter of fact it may not raise any, of course, it must originate in the House under the Constitution. But such a measure originating in the House under the Constitution, and theoretically raising revenue through a tariff, which is a tax, can also carry with it all the implications and all the force of a regulation of commerce, notwithstanding the fact that on its surface it attempts to raise revenue.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky permit a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHITE. Is it the contention of the Senator from Kentucky that a treaty or an agreement which purports to be only a regulation of commerce may, because of that alleged purpose, deal with the entire customs regulations and customs rates of the United States?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is my contention that, as a part of the regulatory machinery of the Congress of the United States conferred upon it by the Constitution, in dealing with our commerce with other nations on the same basis and with the same dignity with which we deal with our commerce among the States, Congress can, under its regulatory powers, deal with commercial matters which, as a part of their effect, include the fixing of customs and taxes as a prerequisite of the entry of goods into the United States.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Wyoming will pardon me, then is not the Senator driven to the position that the power to regulate commerce is superior in its authority and in its character to other provisions of the Constitution, and specifically to the provision of the Constitution that measures affecting the revenues of the United States must originate in the House?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think there is any inconsistency whatever.

Mr. WHITE. In other words, must not the exercise of the power to regulate commerce be construed with reference to all the other provisions of the Constitution, and must it not be limited by other express provisions of the Constitution, and specifically the provision that revenue-raising measures must originate in the House?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no technicality, there is no fine-spun distinction between the interpretation of various interlocking and interwoven sections of the Constitution of the United States; and I do not attempt, in what I have stated—and I apologize to the Senator from Wyoming for presuming to take his time——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is all right; I am glad to have the discussion thus illuminated by the two Senators.

Mr. BARKLEY. I merely rose to ask a question. There is no inconsistency in an interpretation of the Constitution as to the requirement that a revenue bill, a bill which is designed to raise revenue, must originate in the House of Representatives. Inasmuch as the Trade Agreements Act originally, and as it is now proposed to be extended, deals with the question of revenue, even though it be a regulation of commerce, it originated in the House in its original form, and the continuing resolution originated there, and the one now before us originated there. They originated in the House because they deal with the question of customs duties, and therefore do not violate the Constitution, which provides that such a measure, although conferring authority upon the executive branch to deal with that subject, must originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Kentucky at that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As I understand the argument now, the Senator says that he has been very careful to preserve the form in order that he may violate the spirit.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; I said nothing of the sort, and I thought nothing of the sort.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is what the Senator's statement amounts to.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; it does not. Of course, the Senator is a very skillful debater, and he can put into my mind things I do not think and into my mouth things I do not say, and we all do that here sometimes. The point I am endeavoring to make is—and it all resolves itself, I think, to the question of whether or not we can delegate this power—that we can delegate to the President as the agency of Congress the power to help regulate our commerce with other nations, and we might even do it with regard to our domestic commerce. Instead of setting up an Interstate Commerce Commission, instead of setting up a Tariff Commission, instead of setting up a Federal Trade Commission, we may designate some existing executive authority to carry out the will of Congress.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In other words, we may delegate to the President the powers which are now given to the Interstate Commerce Commission? Did the Senator say that?

Mr. BARKLEY. I say that Congress may make the President—I would not say it would go so far as all the details of administration in the Interstate Commerce Commission are concerned——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator has laid down a principle——

Mr. BARKLEY. Congress can delegate to an existing agency the power to carry out its instructions no less than it can create the agency itself.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator mentioned the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission. Does the Senator contend that the Congress has the power to delegate to the President the authority and the functions and the duties which it has imposed on those two bodies under the terms of the pending joint resolution?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not contend that under the terms of the pending joint resolution——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Under the law, under the principle?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not say that, but I say that so far as the regulation of commerce is concerned, Congress can designate an existing agency to carry out its will no less than it can create the agency.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Did not the Senator say that Congress could designate the President as an agency to do this?

Mr. BARKLEY. I was using the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission and the Tariff Commission as examples; and the Tariff Commission, of course, is an agency of Congress in dealing with this very subject. Finally, the Congress has delegated to the President, through the agency and instrumentality and initiation of the Tariff Commission, the power to do the very things here in question with respect to the customs rates, so long as he remains within the 50-percent limitation of the law, which is the same as was provided in the original law.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator be good enough to state to me one subject of legislative power which the Congress could not delegate to the President under the principle which he has enunciated?

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator be good enough to indicate to me one subject of legislative power which, under the principle he has just enunciated, Congress could not delegate to the President?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I could name several, but at the moment I do not intend to go into that subject. However, when I come to argue that point, which I will do a little later——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I hope the Senator will do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I shall endeavor to reply.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me suggest to the Senator some of the points which I should like to have him cover in the argument. If I have understood him correctly, he has stated that under the power to regulate commerce, granted to Congress in the eighth section of article I of the Constitution, Congress may delegate to the President the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. No, the Senator has gone further than I intended him to understand I meant to go.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Well, how far would the Senator go?

Mr. BARKLEY. I say that Congress has the power to regulate commerce——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. How far can it delegate that power?

Mr. BARKLEY. It has the power to coin money and to fix the value thereof. Of course, Congress cannot sit down and physically coin money. It has delegated to the executive department the power to coin money. It has even in the present administration, whether or not the Senator agrees to its wisdom, delegated to the President the power to fix the value of our money. It may be contended, though it has never been admitted, that if Congress can confer upon the President the power to coin money, to exercise the administrative duties and the physical activities of coining money, which has been done by someone appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, Congress can go further in delegating power to an existing agency of the executive department to undertake the details of administration that Congress itself cannot undertake. The statement I made originally was that Congress could designate some existing agency to carry out its will not less than it could create one, or authorize the President to appoint one, to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator says that there must be a standard.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I want the RECORD to be clear about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yet, there must be a standard or a gage set up by Congress in order that the executive or administrative agency undertaking to administer the law may have some guidepost by which it can act.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will yield in a moment. I wish to finish the present discussion with the Senator from Kentucky. The power granted to the President in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is to be found in these words:

> The President, whenever he finds as a fact—

And so forth—

> And that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—

To do what?

> (1) To enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and
> (2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made—

It is to be observed that in the sentence I have just read no standard is laid down, no rule is fixed to guide the discretion of the President. The full, the complete authority is thereby conveyed to him. We now come to the next sentence, which I interpret to be a limitation and not a standard.

> No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly.

In those words which I have read will be found the whole story of this grant of power. In those words must be found the delegation. We do find the delegation. In those words we must find the standard or the rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. Those two subsections cannot be read without reading them in connection with the first part of section 350 which sets out certain conditions.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Which sets out the purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; which sets out the purpose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; I shall be glad to read that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The purpose carries with it, of course, by implication, at least, the condition.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator contend that it contains the standard?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not by itself; but read with the two subsections which the Senator has just read, I do contend that it sets up a sufficiently definite standard by which the President may be guided.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. When the Senator makes his speech I hope he will develop that thought because it is certainly the most tenuous and vague argument that ever I have listened to—in court or in Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. I may not be able to develop it to the satisfaction of the Senator because sometimes the Senator, able as he is and skillful as he is, is like the saying about a woman:

> A woman convinced against her will
> Is of the same opinion still.

[Laughter.]

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, my will was to go along in 1934 and 1937. My will was to help out. I was chided because I went so far, and now, when I have found that the facts are different from what I supposed them to be, I am chided for changing.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not one of the Senators who chided the Senator at that time.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am happy to know that.

Let us pursue this matter. This is the point I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky develop. After reading the introductory paragraph with the paragraphs which I have just read, if it is possible by implication, or inference, or imagination to derive a standard by which we can properly and constitutionally delegate to the President the right to change customs duties 50 percent up or 50 percent down, by what rule, by what argument, will the Senator say that we cannot in the same manner convey to the President the power to raise income taxes 50 percent or reduce them 50 percent?

If we have the right by an act of this kind, which names no specific commodities and provides no specific rates, to convey to the President the power to change customs duties, then, Mr. President, we certainly can delegate away our power to fix income-tax rates by exactly the same formula.

It is to that that I raise my objection. In that instance I point to another illustration of what I call the progressive degeneration of the democratic process. Take a step, and then another step, and then a longer flight beyond.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I wonder if there is a possible distinction? The Senator referred to delegation of power to the President. As I read the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, our tariff act is not amended by the President, but by the agreement. In other words, we delegate to the President and to Great Britain, or to Cuba, for instance, or to some other foreign country the power to make an agreement. That is, we delegate part of the authority to the foreign government actually to change our tariff laws.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There is no doubt about that. The Senator is quite right. I might at this point call attention to clause 1 of the grants contained in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, as follows:

> The President is authorized from time to time to enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof.

What is the delegation there? Certainly there is no delegation there. The President has the power, without delegation from Congress, to enter into agreements with foreign governments. The President has the power, without any suggestion from us, to negotiate bargaining agreements with other nations. So certainly there is no delegation there.

The point and the heart of this whole legislative monstrosity is that we are delegating, without standard or rule, the power vested in us by the Constitution to pass revenue laws, provided that first of all they originate in the House of Representatives. I was contending that the history of the development of this legislation, Mr. President, has been the unbroken story of the loyalty of both Houses of Congress to the Constitution and to its provisions. I have pointed out that after the decision in Field against Clark had been handed down by the Supreme Court, the Congress of the United States, when it undertook to grant the power to negotiate reciprocity agreements, required that they should be ratified by the Senate and approved by a law originating in the House of Representatives. That was in 1897.

As late as 1902 the same question arose, when President Theodore Roosevelt entered into negotiation with the newly liberated Republic of Cuba for a trade treaty. That agreement was signed at Habana on December 11, 1902. It contained a specific provision that it should become effective when approved by Congress. That convention was ratified by the Senate on March 19, 1903. The language of the convention preserving the revenue-making power is simple, clear, and direct. Let me read it:

> This convention shall not take effect until the same shall have been approved by the Congress.

It was approved by the Congress. On December 17, 1903, the act of approval was finally signed by the President. In this act we find another very significant provision. The House of Representatives and the Senate were so jealous to protect the revenue-making power of the Congress, the representatives of the people, that they wrote into the approving act—though it had already been written into the convention, and though the convention had already been ratified—this declaration:

> And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed as an admission on the part of the House of Representatives that customs duties can be changed otherwise than by an act of Congress originating in said House.

Mr. President, I regret that in the history of this country it was not until we had a Democratic House of Representatives and a Democratic Senate, representing all the people of the land, that the Congress was willing to surrender to the Executive the power to originate customs duties.

We have had Democratic precedents. I now cite a precedent which should have much weight, at least with the majority Members of this body. I cite the precedent that when the Democrats had a majority in both Houses under Woodrow Wilson, when Oscar Underwood, the distinguished, able, and long-remembered statesman from Alabama, who had charge of the enactment of the Underwood tariff law, was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, the Democratic majority in the House and in the Senate wrote into that act subsection (a) of section 4, which provided:

> That for the purpose of readjusting the present duties on importations into the United States and at the same time to encourage the export trade of this country, the President of the United States is authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

That, Mr. President, is the declaration of the last Democratic majority. In 1913, the Democratic Party, the great historic party, which has been in existence since the days of Thomas Jefferson and which has always believed in retaining for the people the largest possible proportion of power, insisted, as the Republican Party under previous administrations had insisted, upon retaining in the Congress of the United States the power to ratify and to approve agreements with foreign nations which would change customs duties.

Mr. President, I pointed out to the Finance Committee that the first suggestion for reciprocal-trade agreements without ratification by the Senate or approval by the House was made by Hon. James G. Blaine, a defeated Republican candidate for President. I read the story, taken from the RECORD, showing that he went before the Ways and Means Committee, of which William McKinley, of Ohio—afterward to become President—was then the chairman, and asked that Republican-controlled committee to grant him this unregulated, unlimited power. It was denied him.

Then Senator Vest, of Missouri, distinguished predecessor of my friend from the same State, who has recently questioned me upon the floor, told the story that, coming from the committee in which his proposal had been rejected, Blaine was in such a towering rage that he smashed his high hat upon the table of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

Mr. President, is it not a strange commentary upon this gradual degeneration of the Democratic process that the time has come when a Democratic successor of Secretary Blaine is putting into effect a delegation of legislative power which, through all the history of our Government, neither the Democratic Party nor the Republican Party was ever before willing to grant?

Mr. President, I started to talk about the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, when the proposal was made to go one step further. Until then, Congress had always carefully restrained and restricted the President in the exercise of revenue-making powers. However, in 1922 there came the first proposal for a flexible tariff. Senators will read with profit the debates on the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922. I hope Democratic Senators will read them. They disclose that with few exceptions, the Democratic Members of this body were again arrayed against what they regarded as an unjustifiable, unwarranted, and unconstitutional extension of legislative power to the President.

However, when that act was passed, and the President had been given power to adjust rates in accordance with the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, the Hampton case arose, to which reference has been made here upon several occasions. The Fordney-McCumber flexible-tariff provision carefully restricted this power to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. It was clear from the provision itself that it was the purpose of Congress to lay down the policy that the tariff rates should measure that difference. There was a standard; there was a rule; there was a policy. Congress said to the President, "You shall have authority to change the rates up and down, according to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad."

Mr. Chief Justice Taft handed down the opinion in the Hampton case, upholding that grant of power upon exactly the statement I have just made. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. HARRISON] has brought that decision into this body in his report. Let me read one significant passage from the report:

> Mr. Chief Justice Taft stated these basic principles as follows: "In determining what it (the Congress) may do in seeking assistance from another branch (the executive), the extent and character of that assistance must be fixed according to common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental coordination. * * *

"If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle—

The words "an intelligible principle" are underlined by the committee—

"If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power."

Mr. President, where is the "intelligible principle" in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934? In a colloquy a few moments ago, the distinguished majority leader said that it is to be found in the introductory statement of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and in the language which I have read.

Now let us read that language in order to discern what is the intelligible principle laid down to guide the President:

SEC. 350. (a) For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce)—

Thus far we have only the expression of a pious hope of something to be accomplished, not the expression of an intelligible principle to guide the action of the agency to which the delegation of power is made—by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States—

Is there any principle there, any guiding rule? Again we have only the expression of a hope, of a purpose; we have the language of a preamble.

Continuing with the section—

the President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—

Do we find any intelligible principle in that clause? Does that language point the way by which the power delegated by the Congress to change customs duties must be exercised? It is merely a declaration that when the President finds as a fact that there are undue burdens he may then perform the act which is delegated to him; but the measure of that act has not yet been outlined.

So now we come to the language already read: The President is authorized from time to time—

(1) To enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and

(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

Again we read in vain to find a standard or a principle; again we read in vain to find a guiding rule.

Now we come to the limitation.

No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly, or indirectly.

So, Mr. President, we have delegated to the President carte blanche authority to change tariff rates, customs duties, up and down within the range of 50 percent without any limitation. All the commodities with which the trade of the United States is carried on are contained within the circumference of this grant, and only a limitation of 50 percent is made upon the power.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Am I correct in my understanding that if the President should find that the tariff rate upon any one product was unduly burdening commerce, that would give him the right to enter into a trade agreement and change the rates upon all products of commerce; that is, that he is not limited in the changes made by the trade agreements to products on which he finds there is a discriminatory rate?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The language of the statute is in the plural, not in the singular. It reads:

The President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States.

But I take it from the act that, while he may be required to find that at least two such duties or restrictions are unduly burdening the commerce of the United States, the President is not thereby restricted to changing those duties only, because, otherwise, of course, there would be no possibility of reciprocity; and, of course, the trade agreements have dealt with duties upon commodities of the United States upon which no foreign government had any duty at all. We were surrendering protection which the Congress of the United States in a constitutionally enacted law felt was necessary or desirable in order to obtain some sort of concession from another government.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask the Senator from Wyoming if I am correct in my recollection from reading some of the proclamations of the President putting into effect rates fixed by agreements that in such proclamations he makes no findings of fact as to any particular rate?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is my understanding, but, without examining at least one or two of the agreements, I should not want to say so now.

Mr. ADAMS. I know as to one or two of the agreements that is true. I happen to have seen them recently.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wonder if the Senator would not cite them specifically?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; the Belgian agreement and the British agreement. I was particularly impressed with the Belgian agreement. I was asking whether the President was limited to changing rates which were really clogging international commerce, because I noticed the rate was changed on spinach; I notice in the British agreement lipsticks are included; and I was wondering if the President thought the rates on these important items were unduly burdening interstate commerce and therefore should be lowered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator's inquiry directs my attention to another phase of the act which I think is worthy of a great deal of consideration. What is the power to change which has been granted to the President? What can he change?

The act provides:

To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions—

What are "existing duties"? Are they duties which were existing in 1930 or are they duties which are now existing?

That, Mr. President, is an important question for the sponsors of the pending bill to answer. There have been 22 separate agreements. Each one of them has changed duties which were then in effect. Now we have certain other "existing duties." We are called upon to grant another extension of authority. Would it be improper to argue that in the agreements which will be entered into if, unhappily, this bill should be enacted without one or more of the amendments which are to be proposed, power would then be extended for the additional 3-year period to modify to the extent of 50 percent the then existing duties and not the rates of 1930?

Mr. President, I hope that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky in the argument which he is to make some time later will enter into that question.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I think the importance of the argument requires a better attendance; and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Ellender	Lodge	Schwartz

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I wonder whether I may ask the distinguished Senator from Kentucky what the program is for this evening?

Mr. BARKLEY. The program was, insofar as there was any, to proceed as long as possible.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. How long is "as long as possible"? That is what I desire to know.

Mr. BARKLEY. At least until about 5 o'clock. As the Senator indicated a while ago that he might not desire to conclude his remarks this afternoon, or might not be able to, what is the Senator's program?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There are several matters which I wish to discuss, and I do not believe it will be possible for me to conclude this afternoon. I was hoping that the Senator would find it possible to move an executive session now and that we might resume tomorrow at noon. I rather imagine that I will be able to conclude certainly within an hour tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming, and to other Senators, that if we suspend the consideration of the joint resolution at this time I would feel that we should resume at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. There are no committee meetings to be held tomorrow, and I think the Senate might as well meet at 11, anyway.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I hope the Senator will not insist on that, because obviously that would indicate a little early in the consideration of the joint resolution a desire to begin to hold long sessions.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator realizes that we hope to put in a full day's program in the debate, and when we cannot do it on any day, we might try to make up by meeting earlier the next day.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is already half an hour later than it was when we recessed yesterday.

Mr. BARKLEY. That was the first day of the debate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. This is only the second day.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Kentucky does not wish to make it a practice to meet at 11 o'clock, but only suggests that the Senate convene at 11 o'clock tomorrow in order to meet a situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not saying this is a precedent, but I think we should make as much progress as possible. What are the wishes of the Senator from Mississippi in the matter?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming has stated that he has a cold, and he has been on the floor a good while now, and it is agreeable to me, if the Senator so desires, that the Senate adjourn, and that we not resume at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. I think we can get a vote on the amendment this week.

Mr. BARKLEY. I certainly hope so.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope so.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was our hope, when we started, that we would get a vote on the joint resolution this week.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope we can vote on the amendment at least by Friday.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well. I am willing to suspend, and not meet until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky just stated that there are to be no committee meetings tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should have excepted the Committee on Appropriations, perhaps.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, holding hearings on the Interior Department appropriation bill, which will proceed at 10:30 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the Senator from Wyoming suspending now?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is the Senator about to move a recess until noon tomorrow?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That will be satisfactory, and I shall be glad to suspend now. It is understood that I may continue in the morning?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I do not wish to take the Senator from Wyoming off the floor, but I do desire to make a very brief statement.

Yesterday I was tremendously interested in the colloquy between the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], pertaining to the effect of the reciprocal-trade agreements upon the Cuban tariff on sugar. In that connection, I wish to make a very brief statement.

The original Cuban agreement and the Jones-Costigan amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act were, so far as sugar was concerned, complementary. Under the agreement the United States reduced the duty on Cuban sugar by 60 cents a hundred pounds, from $1.50 to 90 cents. In compensation for this loss of tariff protection the Jones-Costigan amendment established a system of quotas for all sugar-producing areas supplying the United States market. A tax of 50 cents a hundred pounds was imposed on raw sugar, and the money made available from this source was returned to producers in the form of conditional payments. Finally, the agreement specifically provided that the duty would return to $1.50 at any time quotas became inoperative. This guaranty to the domestic industry was given in a note to paragraph 501 of title II of the agreement, as follows:

> If and when the quota provisions of the act "to include sugar beets and sugarcane as basic agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes," approved May 9, 1934, become inoperative, and the Secretary of Agriculture gives public notice that no equivalent limitation on the importation of any article subject to that act has been imposed, the duty on such article imported into the United States of America from the Republic of Cuba shall be determined as though such article were not enumerated and described in this schedule: Provided, however, That such rate of duty shall not exceed that imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement.

Under this provision of the agreement the rate of duty was restored to $1.50, when quotas were suspended by Presidential proclamation last September 11. From that date until the end of the year the Cubans had no quantitative restrictions placed on their shipments to the United States. But that was not enough. They complained bitterly that their sugar was still subject to the processing tax, completely overlooking the fact that domestic sugar was also being taxed, and that domestic producers had no assurance of a continuation of benefit payments.

While the quotas were thus in suspense and Cuban complaints were most vigorous, the administration completed the negotiation of a supplemental trade agreement with Cuba. In that agreement the provision restoring the tariff to $1.50 whenever quotas became inoperative was stricken out. Instead of it, this language was substituted:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding paragraph, if the powers vested in the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States of America under title II of the Sugar Act of 1937 expire and the President of the United States of America gives public notice that no limitation equivalent to that provided for in title II of the Sugar Act of 1937 on the importation into, or the marketing in, the United States of America of sugar originating in the Republic of Cuba has been imposed or provided for by law, the rates of duty on articles enumerated and described in item 501 of this schedule entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption on or after the day following the filing of such public notice with the aforesaid Division of Federal Register, shall be determined without regard to the provisions of column 2 of this schedule, but such rates of duty shall not exceed those in effect on August 24, 1934.

I have been reading from the supplementary trade agreement between the United States of America and the Republic of Cuba, signed at Washington on December 18, 1939.

If there was ever any doubt as to the meaning of this provision, that doubt was dispelled in a letter written by Secretary Hull to Representative MOUTON, of Louisiana. Wrote Mr. Hull:

I have your letter of January 26, 1940, inquiring as to the meaning of the word "expire" in the note to the sugar concession in the trade agreement with Cuba as amended by the supplementary agreement of December 18, 1939.

The first sentence of the paragraph to which you refer reads as follows. * * *

Here the Secretary quoted the paragraph above.

A temporary suspension of the quota provisions of the Sugar Act, as a result of a national economic or other emergency with respect to sugar, prior to the expiration of the powers under the act, would not result in a change in the duty on Cuban sugar.

What does this mean to the domestic sugar industry? It means that at any time the Sugar Act of 1937 or a similar control program is in force, the duty on Cuban sugar cannot be more than 90 cents a hundred pounds, no matter whether quotas are in effect or not. It makes possible the shipment to the United States of unlimited amounts of Cuban sugar during periods in which quotas are suspended, at a duty of 60 cents a hundred less than the actual difference in the costs of production as found by the United States Tariff Commission. It means that the domestic industry, during periods of suspended quotas, must weather the unrestricted competition of Cuban sugar admitted at an insufficient rate of tariff, and that it must continue to pay the processing tax without any assurance that conditional payments will be made to producers.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I am sure that those of us advocating sugar legislation were interested to hear the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON]. It is rather disappointing to me that the State Department should be so concerned over Cuban interests, and that it is willing to favor them at every turn. Again Cuban producers have been given a most advantageous position over domestic producers. It simply means that Cuba has the right to ship unlimited amounts of sugar, when quotas are suspended, at a rate of duty equal to 90 cents per 100 pounds of 96° test instead of $1.50, as provided under the terms of the old agreement. For the information of the Senate, I wish to present some figures on Cuban sugar importations during the period when the quota system was suspended, and also a few days prior to the suspension of quotas, and to call particular attention to importations a few days before the restoration of the quotas was actually made effective.

I do not mean to accuse the State Department of having let the cat out of the bag, as it were, but somehow someone benefited greatly by a suspension of quotas and by the change in the agreement to which the Senator from Colorado has just referred. I will undertake to obtain a list of these beneficiaries for the information of Senators.

The importations of sugar from Cuba from January 1 to August 31 of last year aggregated 2,113,848,773 pounds, or an average of approximately 260,000,000 pounds monthly. All of my figures were obtained from the Department of Commerce records.

In the 12-day period, from September 1 through September 12, the day upon which the quota was suspended, there was imported from Cuba 531,550,322 pounds of sugar.

Senators, listen to this. From September 12 through September 30, all of October, all of November, and through December 25, the entire sugar importations aggregated only 531,141,282 pounds. Said amount of importations was distributed for the period mentioned, as follows:

Sept. 12 through Sept. 30	139,420,039
October	264,479,462
November	97,347,662
Dec. 1 through Dec. 25	29,894,119
Total pounds	531,141,282

On December 26 the President gave notice that he was going to restore the quotas effective on January 1, and in accordance with the supplemental agreement to which the Senator from Colorado referred—during the period from December 26—the date of notice of quota reinstatement—through December 31—the day before quotas were restored—the importations from Cuba aggregated 568,156,174 pounds of sugar.

Mr. President, it is obvious to me that someone must have been "made wise" to these happenings in advance of their actual occurrence. Note the figures that I have submitted and I am certain you will agree that I have a sufficient basis for my statement. As a result of the large importations of sugar made in the last 6 days of 1939, the Federal Treasury was "gypped," I may say, out of approximately $3,400,000. It is possible, however, that had the trade agreement between Cuba and our country not been amended on December 18, 1939—whereby the tariff in effect was lowered to 90 cents before the quotas became effective on January 1, 1940—less sugar would have been imported in the closing days of 1939; and, of course, less foreign-sugar importations would have meant less carry-over into 1940 and, therefore, a substantially larger sugar quota for domestic sugar producers in the year 1940.

Mr. President, may I ask who in the State Department stands out as such an ardent champion and advocate of the Cuban cause?

Mr. PRESIDENT. I send to the desk an amendment to the pending joint resolution, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table, and also to have printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

SEC. —. (a) No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and no modification hereafter made in any such foreign trade agreement, shall provide for a rate of duty on sugar imported from any foreign country which will be lower during any period than the rate applicable on September 1, 1934, to sugar imported from such foreign country, unless during such period (1) the quantity of imported sugar which may be marked annually in the United States is by act of Congress restricted to a quantity no greater than the quantity of imported sugar which may be marketed annually under the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937, and (2) benefits for domestic producers of sugar are provided which are substantially equivalent to those provided for in the Sugar Act of 1937.

(b) As used in this section, the term "sugar" includes any article to which the provisions of paragraph 501 of the Tariff Act of 1930 were applicable.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON FORESTRY

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the time for the Joint Committee on Forestry to make its report expires on the 1st of April, which is now within a few days. The committee has not yet completed its work. So the committee reported a concurrent resolution asking Congress to extend the time within which it may submit its report until February 1, 1941, without asking for any additional money. The resolution is on the calendar, and I ask for its immediate consideration. The minority leader, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is familiar with the matter, since he is a member of the committee. The majority leader is also willing to have the resolution adopted.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 39, Calendar No. 1361.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. AUSTIN in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 39) submitted by Mr. BANKHEAD on March 4, 1940, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 26, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, before whose face the generations rise and pass away, we pray for strength and wisdom to live in peace and joy. Sanctify our aspirations in everything that elevates and refines. We pray that we may have Thy greatness of spirit which is the gift of Thy love, that even in the little things we may discern the Lord's way. We thank Thee for the glory of the morning and for the life with which the firmament is brimming. If we have taken Thy bread and it brought to us no message; if we have enjoyed a night of rest and it left us with no sense of gratitude; if we have had enjoyment and encouragement and have not seen Thee in them, do Thou open our eyes. Heavenly Father, it shall be a glorious ministry if Thou wilt send us forth in the common ways of service and find that they glow with the presence of the Lord. Help us to labor on, discharging little duties, attending to little deeds, neglecting no kindly fellowship and conscious that our daily lives are hallowed by the blessing of Thy guidance. Unto Thee be eternal praise. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 41. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Special Committee of the Senate to Investigate the Administration and the Economic and Commercial Effect of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 to print additional copies of its hearings.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1759) entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the States of Montana, North Dakota, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact or agreement for division of the waters of the Yellowstone River," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. WHEELER, and Mr. FRAZIER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

COMMERCIAL AVIATION IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, today marks a notable milestone in the history of American progress and achievement. This morning at 3:50 a. m. American air lines completed 1 year without a fatality. In the last 12 months all of the commercial air lines in the United States, carrying more than 2,000,000 passengers, flying more than 814,000,000 passenger-miles, completed the year without a fatal accident to any passenger, to any member of a crew, to any other person, or a serious injury to any of them. The railroads, heretofore the safest method of transportation, have had wrecks and fatalities. On the highways truck, bus, and automobile have killed and injured thousands. Even our usually placid water-borne traffic reports heavy loss of life. But in the air, the safest, the fastest, the most convenient, the most efficient method of transportation, we have not had a single fatal accident. [Applause.]

The popularity of air travel has kept pace with its mechanical perfection. During the first years of aviation the bulk of air traffic comprised business people on emergency missions or pioneers in timesaving hazards. As late as 1927 it required 33 hours to cross the continent, and the trip was made in narrow cockpits of single-motored planes at a fare of $400 for the trip. Today giant 12-ton, twin-engined sky sleepers span the continent overnight, with meals aboard and every comfort and convenience the most modern caravansary affords at hardly more than Pullman prices. And the continent no longer limits travel schedules by either land or sea. On a recent trip on the Yankee Clipper I had supper in America and breakfast in Europe, outrivaling the fabulous flights of the magic carpet of Baghdad. On American aircraft we may take the wings of the morning and sojourn, at will, in the uttermost parts of the earth.

Is it to be wondered that America is becoming air-conscious and air-minded? In the calendar year of 1937 the commercial air lines of the country carried 1,000,000 passengers; in 1938, 1,300,000 passengers; in 1939, 1,800,000 passengers; and for the year ending today, March 26, 1940, over 2,000,000 passengers.

In 1937 there was one fatality for every 12,000,000 passenger-miles; in 1938, 1 for every 22,000,000 passenger-miles; in 1939, 1 for every 82,000,000 passenger-miles, and for the year ending this morning, not a single serious accident of any kind in a total of 814,000,000 passenger-miles, the safest and swiftest method of travel or transportation from those ancient days when Mercury carried the messages of the gods from Mount Olympus down to this supreme hour. Today American aviation closes a year in which it has broken all records, a year in which it has carried the greatest number of passengers, in which it has flown the greatest number of planes, in which it has traversed the greatest number of passenger-miles—and a year in which every passenger has stepped from its runways whole and well and rested and thrilled by marvelous flights through the heavens outwinging the migratory flight of the fastest homing bird.

It is particularly fitting that this remarkable progress should be made, and this astounding record achieved by the Nation that developed the airplane and through it changed the history of the world. And most gratifying of all—that while in Europe aviation is giving wings to death and speed to destruction and carnage, here in America we are accelerating commerce and travel and all the arts of peace in contributions to national welfare and to the happiness and prosperity of every American citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the able gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] are timely and true. Supplementing his observations, I recall that on January 15, 1936, I stood in this Chamber and commented on a commercial air-line accident which had taken place the previous night with a loss of 17 lives.

In discussing that tragedy I took occasion to state:

Commercial aviation in America and in the world today has been dealt a stunning blow, but only temporarily so, because in the future those who are charged with carrying on this great industry will continue to so improve the planes in which men and women fly, so improve the airports where the planes land and take off, and so improve all conditions necessary to successful continued progress in aviation that they will lessen greatly the number of casualties.

In my remarks on that occasion I expressed the hope that Members of Congress would encourage improvements and legislation which would aid in taking away "from commercial aviation certain of the hazards and dangers which still exist." Now comes a year with a perfect record for safety.

The 18 domestic air lines of the country have carried more than 2,000,000 persons, and, as the gentleman from Missouri has said, without a single fatality. This network of our domestic transport system crisscrosses this Nation and injects a new lifeblood into our stream of transportation.

There are many factors which bring about this splendid record. The air lines themselves have done a real job with improved equipment, efficient and devoted personnel, and with the realization that they must provide with speed the desired safety. The enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Authority law, which brings about proper regulation and a greater degree of safety for the commercial air lines of the United States has been of real help in establishing this truly noteworthy achievement. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article by Martelle W. Trager appearing in the Washington Post day before yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to a table showing the spending of the American Presidents beginning with George Washington down to the present time. In that table it is shown that in 144½ years all the Presidents' administrations expended $112,203,367,065, and that Mr. Roosevelt's administration spent in 8 long years $65,628,526,692, or about 58 percent of the total expenditure of all previous administrations. The total receipts of the 144½ years from Washington to Mr. Roosevelt amounted to $91,586,076,130, for all of the Presidents, and Mr. Roosevelt's receipts in 8 years amounted to $40,089,857,957, or 58 percent as much as all the former administrations.

Mr. Speaker, the worst thing that this Congress ever did was when it gave the President of the United States so much money to squander. That money has now to be paid back by the oncoming generation. Nothing like it ever happened before in the history of our Nation. Mr. Roosevelt has doubled our national debt almost.

When Mr. Roosevelt came into office our national debt was $22,538,672,164, and when he leaves office it will be $45,000,000,000 plus. The plus, which includes all the obligations of the Government in the various departments and corporations of the Government, we count as worth 100 cents on the dollar; and the fact that much of our assets of the Government are only worth 30, 40, or 50 percent, and so forth, on the dollar, we no doubt will lose billions when we try to discontinue the organizations or liquidate them.

Mr. Roosevelt, why do you not follow the Democratic platform on which you were elected in 1932 and which you promised to support?

[Here the gavel fell.]

KEEP THE RECORD STRAIGHT

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] again compare the expenditures of the present administration with the other administrations back as far as George Washington's time, but he has not taken the pains to compare the conditions under which the various administrations served.

It is true that when George Washington was President we had emerged from a revolution in which we had overthrown an empire. At the close of the Civil War, we had gone through and experienced an internal controversy among ourselves. These upheavals left grave and expensive problems with which to deal. But none of them compared in magnitude with the condition which confronted this administration when Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated as President in 1933.

We had had the Harding administration with all of its extravagance, with all its "revelry," with its Doheneys, its Daughertys, its Forbes, its Falls—with the national conscience so lulled into insensibility by superbarrages of Republican propaganda that it did not sufficiently react against the corruptions exposed in the Teapot Dome scandal to bring about a change of administration. It was succeeded by the Coolidge administration which continued the old regime; and was in turn succeeded by the Hoover administration, which did not have the courage to make a change.

During that time the party in power took the taxes off of the incomes of the rich and placed them on the shoulders of the poor. It reduced the income taxes of the multimillionaires who made or increased their fortunes out of the World War, and transferred the burden to the masses of this country by placing upon them the highest protective tariffs ever known in times of peace. Those tariffs, which were nothing in God's world but indirect taxes upon everything the laboring man had to buy from the cradle to the grave, wrung from the unprotected masses of the American people amounts estimated as high as $4,000,000,000 a year—for which they got practically nothing in return—and poured it into the pockets of the beneficiaries of those tariff laws.

They then contracted the currency and drove farm prices down to where the farmer's buying power virtually disappeared. Those tariffs provoked retaliation on the part of every country in the world until they raised their own tariff barriers and drove our foreign trade from the seas.

With the farmers' buying power gone, with our foreign trade destroyed, with our currency contracted to such a point as to drive commodity prices below the danger line, our industries broke down, and our national economy collapsed. We were threatened with revolution and chaos, and the American people were appealing for leadership to save us from disaster.

That is the condition that prevailed when Mr. Roosevelt took office in 1933. Something had to be done. I do not say the administration has not made mistakes, but I do say that all the money we have spent would not have paid the cost of a bloody revolution, which our institutions might not have survived.

Besides, the gentleman from Pennsylvania overlooks the fact that while we were going into this depression the administration then in power was giving back to the big-income taxpayers and the big-estate taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars annually that had already been collected, and when returned to them it was not passed on back to the masses of the people who originally paid the bills. He seems to overlook the fact that the reductions in the national debt which they claim the Republican administration made came about as a result of the cancelation of war contracts and the sale of war materials, and turning the funds back into the Federal Treasury.

Neither the Harding, the Collidge, nor the Hoover administration ever balanced the Budget out of the revenues of the Government.

Another little item of expense to the American people he should not overlook is the loss of $6,200,000,000 the Republican administration incurred for the American people by refunding the foreign debt, stretching it out over a period of 60 years, and reducing the rate of interest so far below that of our outstanding bonds as to cost the American people $6,200,000,000, and at the same time aiding the international bankers who sponsored that movement to encourage foreign nations to repudiate the national debt and virtually cancel the entire amount of about $12,000,000,000.

One of the greatest speeches I ever heard in this House was made by Cordell Hull against the bill to fund the Italian debt. Every prediction he made at that time has come true.

To hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] talk one would think that all the money to which he refers as having been spent by this administration has been entirely wasted. He gives no credit for the billions of dollars in loans that will be paid back with interest, and that have been used for internal improvements that will be of permanent value to every community. He gives no credit for the money that has been spent for employment of millions of people who would otherwise have been out of employment and would probably have stormed every industry and every commercial establishment in America.

He gives no credit for the money that has been spent in internal improvements, in constructing the greatest system of highways the country has ever had, in building bridges, schoolhouses, courthouses, draining our streams, and controlling floods—permanent improvements that will be of lasting benefit to the people in every State in the Union, and especially in the agricultural States.

He gives us no credit, but rather attempts to discredit us, for the money that has been invested to save the water power of this Nation, to improve navigation, to control floods, conserve the soil, and preserve our timber supply.

This money has not been wasted; it will come back with interest, and with interest many times compounded, in the improvement of living conditions throughout the country.

He gives us no credit for the first system of rural electrification this Nation ever had, and one it probably would not have had for another generation if his party had remained in power. It has electrified millions of farm homes, and brought to those homes contentment and joy and comfort and relief from the drudgeries of life.

He gives us no credit for having forced reductions of light and power rates to the 27,000,000 consumers of electricity throughout the country by more than $600,000,000 a year, which is enough within itself, if applied to that purpose, to pay every dollar this administration has spent, and pay off the national debt in another generation.

These attacks are made for the purpose of discrediting this administration before the American people, and bringing their party back into power at the fall elections.

You notice they never attempt to tell the American people what they propose to do if they come into power. Probably they would go back and give us another dose of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover regime.

If that is to be our fate, then God save the country. [Applause.]

PROPOSED MAXIMUM RATE OF INCOME TAX

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Speaker, on March 15 of this year the Rhode Island House of Representatives, by a vote of 42 to 28, with 3 pairs, passed a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to taxes on incomes, inheritances, and gifts. The resolution had been passed on February 16 by the Rhode Island Senate by a vote of 21 to 6. The proposed amendment provides that the power of Congress to impose taxes on incomes, inheritances, and gifts shall be limited to a maximum rate of 25 percent, except that in the case of a war creating a grave national emergency the limitation may temporarily be removed by a three-fourths vote of each House of Congress.

The resolution to which I refer is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Rhode Island, That application be, and it hereby is, made to the Congress of the United States of America to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration: Provided, That in no case shall the maximum rate of tax exceed 25 percent.

"SEC. 3. The maximum rate of any tax, duty, or excise which Congress may lay and collect with respect to the devolution or transfer of property, or any interest therein, upon or in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, or by way of gift, shall in no case exceed 25 percent.

"SEC. 4. The limitations upon the rates of said taxes contained in sections 2 and 3 shall, however, be subject to the qualification that in the event of a war in which the United States is engaged creating a grave national emergency requiring such action to avoid national disaster, the Congress, by a vote of three-fourths of each House, may for a period not exceeding 1 year increase beyond the limits above prescribed the maximum rate of any such tax upon income subsequently accruing or received or with respect to subsequent devolutions or transfers of property, with like power, while the United States is actively engaged in such war, to repeat such action as often as such emergency may require.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect at midnight on the 31st day of December following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States after said date to collect any tax on incomes for any period ending on or prior to said 31st day of December laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect.

"SEC. 6. Section 3 shall take effect at midnight on the last day of the sixth month following the ratification of this article. Nothing contained in this article shall affect the power of the United States to collect any tax on any devolution or transfer occurring prior to the taking effect of section 3, laid in accordance with the terms of any law then in effect"; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, requested to provide as the mode of ratification that said amendment shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution of the United States, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he hereby is, directed to send a duly certified copy of this resolution to the Senate of the United States and one to the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

This proposal for the amendment of the Federal Constitution is being advocated by the American Taxpayers Association, Inc., Washington, D. C., as part of its national program.

Last year a similar resolution, but without the exception in the case of war, was passed by both branches of the Wyoming Legislature, the Iowa House of Representatives, the New Jersey Senate, and the Wisconsin Senate, in which the vote was unanimous.

The purpose of this resolution is to force action that will aid in removing the obstacles which prevent the investment of private funds in productive enterprise. Billions of dollars are lying idle in the banks, which, if put to work, would give employment to the great masses of unemployed and restore prosperity to the country.

The present administration since it came into power has been trying remedy after remedy to overcome the business depression from which this country has been suffering for some years past. Despite the fact that the administration has spent billions of dollars of the people's money and has increased the national debt from about $22,500,000,000 on June 30, 1933, to more than $42,000,000,000 at the present time, we still have 9,000,000, and according to some estimates as many as 10,000,000, unemployed. During this period taxes have been drastically increased and money has been lavished on public undertakings in a vain endeavor to stimulate the forces of recovery.

It has become evident to every thinking person that the job cannot be done by the Government and that it can be done, if at all, by private enterprise and by private enterprise alone. Consequently it is of the utmost importance that private enterprise be revived; but this can be accomplished only by a restoration of business confidence, which has been destroyed largely as a result of the present unjust and confiscatory system of taxation. At present few dare to risk funds in legitimate productive enterprise because of fear of what the Government may do and the realization that if the undertaking is successful the greater part of the profit will go to the Government, and if it is unsuccessful the investor will lose all. A material change in our tax laws, and in particular a reduction in rates, is necessary to restore business confidence.

Strange as it may seem, if past experience is any guide to the future, the effect of a reduction in the rates of income taxes will be to increase revenue rather than to reduce it. This results from the fact that a reduction in rates would stimulate business, which in turn would increase the national income, which in turn would increase the national tax revenue.

Economists have long recognized that excessively high tax rates on incomes are self-defeating so far as the securing of revenue is concerned and that there is a point of diminishing returns beyond which the revenue produced is less rather than greater.

On this point the late President Wilson, in his message to Congress in 1918, said:

> The Congress might well consider whether the higher rates of income and profits taxes can in peacetime be effectively productive of revenue and whether they may not, on the contrary, be destructive of business activity and productive of waste and inefficiency. There is a point at which in peacetime high rates of income and profits taxes discourage energy, remove the incentive to new enterprise, encourage extravagant expenditures, and produce industrial stagnation, with consequent unemployment and other attendant evils.

In his Lincoln Day address at New York on February 12, 1924, the late President Coolidge, supporting the position which had earlier been taken by President Wilson and three Secretaries of the Treasury—Carter Glass and Secretary Houston, both Democrats, and Andrew Mellon, a Republican—in advocating a reduction in income-tax rates, said:

> The first object of taxation is to secure revenue. When the taxation of large incomes is approached with that in view, the problem is to find a rate which will produce the largest returns. Experience does not show that the higher rate produces the larger revenue. Experience is all in the other way. * * *
> I agree perfectly with those who wish to relieve the small taxpayer by getting the largest possible contribution from the people with large incomes. But if the rates on large incomes are so high that they disappear, the small taxpayer will be left to bear the entire burden. If, on the other hand, the rates are placed where they will produce the most revenue from large incomes, then the small taxpayer will be relieved. The experience of the Treasury Department and the opinion of the best experts place the rate which will collect most from the people of great wealth, thus giving the largest relief to people of moderate wealth, at not over 25 percent.

Likewise, Walter Lippmann, in an article appearing in the Providence Evening Bulletin of March 28, 1939, said:

> The fact that a reduction of tax rates will seem to yield less revenue out of the present national income should not be regarded as an objection to this reform. For lower rates, by making private investment profitable, will eventually yield a larger revenue out of a larger national income; by reviving private investment, they will make less necessary the current amount of public spending.
> But the national income can be increased only by a revival of private investment, and private investment can be revived only by enhancing private profit, and private profit can be enhanced only by taking less of the profit in taxes.

The contention that a reduction in tax rates will increase revenue is well supported by the actual experience of the Federal Government. For example, in 1926 Congress passed a tax act reducing the maximum rates of normal and surtaxes from 46 percent under the 1924 act to 25 percent under the 1926 act. The effect on the revenue of the years 1927 to 1929, inclusive, was an increase in each year amounting in 1928 alone to $275,000,000.

It is therefore not unreasonable to expect that the proposed reduction in income-tax rates to a maximum of 25 percent will produce greater rather than less revenue.

The need of revising our tax laws is also recognized by Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, who, in a statement made 2 years ago, declared:

> Our experience during the past 5 years has proven conclusively that Government spending can only supply temporary relief. The spending of vast sums in relief payments, no matter how necessary they may be, will not restore to the workers their jobs in those industries.

The real remedy for unemployment is the creation and maintenance of work opportunities for working men and women in private industry.

How can this best be accomplished?

* * * * * * *

There should be a complete revision of our tax laws. Taxes provide the greatest single contribution to the cost of living today. It makes no difference whether these taxes are paid in the first instance by big business, industry, the public utilities, the railroads, the banks, or the insurance companies; it is the ultimate consumer who pays them in the end. * * *

There is abroad the general belief and conviction that the tax policy of the Government, coupled with its apparent attitude toward industry, is preventing the normal expansion of American industry. It is the common belief that undue and unjust taxes are keeping billions of dollars of idle capital lying in the banks of the country because capital is afraid to take excursions into new enterprises or to assist in the expansion of old ones.

The Brookings Institution, in a study completed in April 1939, and published as Pamphlet No. 21 under the title "Taxation and Capital Investment," says:

Our analysis shows that the capital market needs investment in stock or equity securities. Yet at many points the taxation system penalizes such investment.

In the light of the analysis which we have made, we offer the following recommendations:

The surtax rates in the upper brackets should be substantially reduced. * * *

It is our view that even if there should be, immediately speaking, a considerable net reduction in tax revenues, the gains resulting from the stimulus to the expansion of private enterprise would, in the near future, much more than offset any probable revenue losses. Taxation revenues will pretty much take care of themselves if we can achieve full economic recovery.

The suggested reduction in taxes would obviously accrue directly to the benefit of those in the higher income classes, but if our analysis of the bearing of present tax policies upon recovery and capital expansion is correct, the benefits will shortly accrue to the Nation as a whole.

We must choose between an arrested flow of funds into new capital enterprise—which halts economic progress and perpetuates stagnation—and a modification in the system of taxation, even if such modification appears to run counter to current conceptions with respect to such problems as justice in taxation and the redistribution of wealth through the medium of tax machinery. The primary need at this time—outweighing every other consideration—is the stimulation of capital expansion.

In the Monthly Survey of Business of the American Federation of Labor of July–August 1939, the following statements are made:

In all past periods of great industrial production we have depended on "venture capital" to lift business activity to higher levels. Businessmen who have funds they can invest have been willing to risk their savings to build new income-producing plants—factories and equipment, power plants, farm machinery, railroads, mines—all these have been built in the past with private-venture capital. This equipment has made higher living standards possible; its building in periods of expansion created hundreds of thousands of jobs and lifted industry to high levels of activity; its production when built made profits on the original investment.

At present so-called venture capital is not seeking investment in industry because businessmen do not see enough prospect of profits to justify the risk. In the decade before depression, venture capital flowed freely into productive investment and our industries rose to the highest production levels in history.

Today the chance of succeeding in business is said to be only about 50 percent as great as in predepression years, and the rewards of success are about 20 percent less. In addition, those who have succeeded are forced to give a larger part of their income to the Government through increased income taxes. This explains why venture capital runs to shelter in safe and tax-free investments like Government bonds. Our great need today is to give businessmen the kind of assurance which will enable them to look forward to the future with confidence.

Incidentally, the assertion so often made that the rich pay most of the taxes is utterly false. The rich are "soaked good and plenty," but if the total income of all those receiving more than $100,000 in 1938 were confiscated by taxation—all of it taken—it would pay the cost of the Government for less than 15 days.

Another effect of the Federal Government's present tax policy is to destroy the independence of the States and to make them dependent upon the Federal Government.

In a radio address on the Federal education bill, delivered on April 10, 1939, Senator PETER G. GERRY, of Rhode Island, declared:

I say with deliberation that if the trend of increased Federal grants continues, the States as we have known them will be unable to exist, or they will exist as bankrupt and powerless pawns of the Federal Government—no longer self-sustaining governments but merely vassal communities, coming with hat in hand to beg for funds from the Federal Government. When that time comes, American democracy, now nourished by the intimate participation of its cititzens in their affairs, will be quite dead. That which gave it vitality will have passed away.

This seizure by the Federal Government of the wealth of the people has made it increasingly difficult for the States and municipalities to raise the revenue needed for their operations, and as a result a number of municipalities and States throughout the country are in financial distress.

On February 4, 1940, a group of leaders of the American Federation of Labor issued a statement at Miami, Fla., drafted after a study of 7 years of the New Deal, in which they called on Americans to "join in a united effort to halt the drift toward national insolvency."

I quote from this statement as follows:

For 7 years a great experiment has been undertaken by the Federal Government upon the industrial and social economy of the United States. * * *

It has been an experiment on the lives of 125,000,000 Americans. It has profoundly affected the conditions and the relations of the worker and the employer. It has affected trade and finance, industry and agriculture, government and business. * * *

Labor has long recognized that the worker cannot be secure in employment unless industry is prosperous. * * *

Experiments are costly luxuries. For the upkeep of innumerable boards, bureaus, and authorities, for the maintenance of persistent relief rolls, and the building of new and imposing Government enterprises, the cost has been met by increased taxes and increased public debt.

One of the great drags upon industry during the past 7 years has been the burden of taxation that has been imposed upon big and little business. There are literally thousands of industrial and commercial concerns which have been forced into red figures by the taxes which have been imposed on flagging business. * * *

With money taxed or borrowed from the people the Federal Government has set up a multitude of public and semipublic corporations, which have gone into the States to weaken the authority and the financial soundness of the States. * * *

It is not a problem for labor alone, nor industry and agriculture alone. It is a problem which must be solved by an awakened citizenship. It is a problem to be discussed at every fireside, to be dealt with by every publicist, to be prayerfully considered by those Americans who this year will be called upon to draft the platforms of both political parties.

The hour has come for Americans to recognize the dangers that confront them and to join in a united effort to halt the drift toward national insolvency and industrial collapse, and to extend opportunity for the Americans of today and tomorrow.

In the House of Representatives on February 1, 1940, the Congressman from Texas, the Honorable HATTON W. SUMNERS, expressing in effect the same views, said:

The States must be restored to the status of the responsible sovereign agencies of general government or democracy cannot live in America. * * *

There can be no uncertainty as to the effect of that policy—namely, the concentration of power in Washington—upon the States when, in addition to that, we tap the sources of State revenue and bring to Washington the money required by the States to discharge their governmental duties and then use that money to dissolve the States by attaching directly to the Federal Government, through loans and grants from the Federal Treasury, the subdivisions of the States—their counties, their cities, their school districts, their businesses, their private citizens; and attaching to this money, when we send a part of it back to the States, the power of Federal control. When we do that we do what the enemies of our democracy could not do to the structure of our Government and to the governmental capacity of the people upon whose capacity to govern our democracy absolutely depends.

As it was the responsibility of our people 150 years ago to establish the Federal organization, in just as definite a sense it is our responsibility to preserve our democracy, not only for the sake of the democracy but for the sake of the Federal organization as well. There can be but one end to a policy of weakening the structure of the underlying States and at the same time continuing to increase the Federal overload.

This is not a partisan matter; it is not a sectional matter; it is not that of any department. None are free from responsibility. It is the concern and business of all the people, of all the parties, and of all the officials of all the departments of government—Federal and State.

The time has come for the States to assert themselves and to secure a return of the power which the Federal Government has been steadily taking from them. The Federal Government is but a government of delegated powers, delegated by the States, and the powers not delegated are reserved to the States. Historically, therefore, the States are the masters and the Federal Government the servant. This relationship must be restored.

To this end there is no more important step to be taken than to curb the taxing power of the Federal Government in the manner prescribed by the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution. This curb will serve the double purpose of limiting the power of the Federal Government and at the same time increasing the power of the States through affording them a greater opportunity for the raising of revenue.

DUTY OF CITIZENS OF NEUTRAL COUNTRIES

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks by the inclusion of a letter from the National Small Business Men's Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, with Europe engaged in a major conflict and every nation suspicious of the other, it is for us, a neutral, and the citizens of this country, to think wisely and carefully before making statements which would indicate a sympathy with either of the belligerents, even though it is human nature to take sides and all of us inside have a feeling of sympathy for one or the other. It is more important, however, that each and every public official and particularly those who by their positions presumably speak for the Government of the United States, to refrain from making any statement, insinuation, or indication that he, as an official or as a representative of the Government, has any feeling of antagonism or friendship with any of the nations at war.

It was stated by our Minister to Canada, Mr. James H. R. Cromwell, that he in all probability would lose his official head and, if so, to bring on the executioner. If it were only his head in danger, it would make little difference because he brought it on himself and is responsible for his own actions. However, when dealing with the jealousies and suspicions of nations in conflict, a statement by a representative of a country does not merely risk an official head of his own, but gambles with the lives of the cream of American manhood and the possibility of drawing the United States into war, with a loss of life and the other appurtenant hardships of war, which he would not have to be a participant of.

The following is a letter received by me from the National Small Business Men's Association, a national organization:

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Akron, Ohio, March 23, 1940.

Hon. ALBERT L. VREELAND,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN VREELAND: At the second annual convention of the National Small Business Men's Association, Inc., held in the city of Detroit, Mich., on October 10, 11, 12, 1939, the delegates there assembled adopted the following resolution:

"2. That all officials and employees of the Government be required to refrain from making any public statements which might be construed as partisan or as an unfriendly act to any foreign government."

American Minister to Canada James H. R. Cromwell has been found guilty of violating the rules laid down by the State Department for the conduct of foreign representatives of this country and such guilty conduct is not only a contravention of the terms of the above-quoted resolution, but constitutes a personal affront to millions of loyal American citizens who believe it is essential to the welfare of this country that we maintain a strict neutrality insofar as the unfortunate conditions abroad are concerned.

Cromwell's first public address at Ottawa was, in fact every public utterance he has made in Canada since assuming the duties of his high office has been, sophomoric and entirely lacking in the high quality of statesmanship which the American people have a right to expect and demand from their representatives in foreign countries.

The rebuke of the Secretary of State will not overcome the harm that Cromwell's highly partisan utterances have occasioned and his conduct has brought the country a little nearer to possible participation in a sad conflict with which we as a nation can have only the deepest regret.

We trust that you will agree with us in our insistence that the United States must maintain a strictly neutral position and that the public officials who, either through ignorance or a lack of comprehension of the effect of their words, violate the confidence reposed in them by the citizens of their country, should be recalled and dismissed.

You are urged to take such action in the premises as your considered judgment deems consistent with the best interests of the country.

Respectfully yours,

J. RAYMOND TIFFANY,
General Counsel.

HARRY BRIDGES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a letter from Mr. John P. Beale, chairman, legislative commission of the American Legion, and an editorial sent to me by the department commander of the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD today a letter from Mr. John P. Beale, chairman of the legislative commission of the American Legion, dealing with the deportation of undesirable aliens. I am also placing in the RECORD an editorial from the American Legion magazine received from William S. Dunn, department commander of California, regarding Harry Bridges and the statement he filed in connection with his application for citizenship. I hope that every Member will read that record, because he has made application for citizenship, and I hope that it will be denied. I trust that those of you who will read it will address a letter asking that this citizenship be not granted to Harry Bridges. [Applause.]

The matters referred to are as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., March 16, 1940.

Hon. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN,
Chairman, Immigration and Naturalization Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DICKSTEIN: The American Legion of California urges and advocates the enactment of legislation similar in scope and purpose to that contained in H. R. 8310, now pending before the Immigration and Naturalization Committee, of which you are the chairman.

Aliens are permitted to assume residence in the United States not as a matter of right but as a matter of privilege, and when there is a violation of the hospitality of our country, most assuredly there should be legislation to provide for the deportation of such aliens that violate our hospitality. There is at the present time no legislation on the statute books providing ways and means for the deportation of undesirable aliens. H. R. 8310 would provide the machinery by which undesirable aliens could be deported, and although said bill might be subject to possible refinements or minor amendments, its need is imperative to end a condition that no other country in the world would suffer to exist.

Your consideration of the foregoing will be greatly appreciated.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN P. BEALE,
Chairman, Legislative Commission.

TWO MATTERS OF IMPORTANCE

As the American people entered the year 1940 there were two developments on the home front that merited the attention of those concerned with keeping the United States free of totalitarian influence. One of these was the cancelation of deportation proceedings by the United States Department of Labor against the notorious alien "red," Harry Bridges, after Dean James M. Landis, of the Harvard Law School, special examiner for the Labor Department, had held that evidence presented by agents of the Government and interested citizens failed to prove that Bridges was a member of the Communist Party. The second was the report to Congress of the Dies committee, which for some 2 years has been investigating subversive activities in the United States.

The Dies committee report asked the current session of Congress to provide funds so that the committee might continue its work. Congress can hardly refuse to give its enthusiastic endorsement and support to this highly important body, and it is to be hoped that a generous amount of money will be appropriated so that the work of further ferreting out un-American activities, whether Communist or Nazi or Fascist, may be prosecuted vigorously. Thanks to this committee we know of the twistings and turnings of the "party line" of the Communists in this country, but there remain many details of the boring from within tactics of the "reds" which ought to be brought into the full light of day.

The Dies committee report and the Landis whitewash of Bridges show parts of the jigsaw picture of communism at work in this country. The American Legion has given the Dies committee unstinted cooperation from the very beginning. The Legion has also insisted upon the Government deportation proceeding against Bridges. We emphatically dissent from the Landis findings, and for this reason: The hearings of the Dies committee proved beyond cavil that it is a practice among Communists to deny membership in the party whenever the heat is turned on, and the hearings also showed that records are conveniently lost when investigators delve into the matter of party affiliation. "By their fruits ye shall know them," and anyone who has followed the slimy trail of Bridges in his dealings on the Pacific coast cannot but conclude that this alien is a high priest of communism. He hates the American system of government with all his heart and is trying to overturn it.

The Legion doesn't propose to allow the Bridges deportation case to die, even though the Labor Department head continues the coddling which he has had from her throughout the years. In her Department is a hefty file of evidence which, quite aside from the Communist angle, is sufficient to brand Bridges as an undesirable. Reproduction of part of an article, printed below, which appeared in the Capitol Daily at Washington, D. C., nearly a year ago which establishes that this alien swore falsely in naturalization proceedings and that he was not in any sense "a person of good moral character."

Bridges must go; the Dies committee must be continued. Common sense demands that the Nation guard itself against the preaching of hate and violence by an alien who has no right to its protection. And the job of completing the rout of the American Communists which the Soviet-German agreements started can be accomplished through continuance in all its vigor of the Dies committee, hated foe of the "fellow travelers."

SOMETHING ABOUT BRIDGES

Just before the end of the year 1939 Dean James M. Landis, special examiner for the United States Department of Labor, following an exhaustive hearing, issued a report clearing Harry Bridges, notorious radical, whose deportation as an undesirable alien has been demanded by the American Legion and numerous other patriotic organizations, of charges that he belonged to the Communist Party. Subsequently Secretary Perkins rescinded the deportation charge. Although proceedings against Bridges through the Department are held up, the Legion does not accept the Perkins action as the final word in this case. The following account, part of an extended summary of Bridges' activities which appeared in the Capitol Daily, of Washington, D. C., on February 15, 1939, and which was written by Leslie Elwood Sanders, in itself provides sufficient evidence to convince any ordinary person of Bridges' undesirability. It should be emphasized that this material was available for purposes of the record before ever Dean Landis began examining witnesses. The facts as here presented warrant the attention, we believe, of every person who loves America.—The editors, the American Legion magazine.

Harry Renton Bridges is an alien in the United States awaiting a hearing on deportation charges which were scheduled to have been heard in San Francisco on April 25, 1938. Bridges was served with a warrant on March 5, 1938, and was given a preliminary examination at the Baltimore office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service before Assistant Director L. R. Fouch, after which he was held for hearing on the deportation charge.

Bridges has never had to appear for the hearing on the charge because of the intervention of the Department of Labor, which acted on the ground that "such hearing would be a waste of time," and at present is still under warrant to appear whenever the Department of Justice, under authority of the Department of Labor, takes action.

In a release issued in March 1938 the Department of Labor stated briefly that Bridges had first been charged with communism in 1934 and that an investigation was made at that time, and that a report was filed on February 2, 1935, but that no action was taken until the fall of 1937, when "certain persons filed new complaints against Bridges in the Seattle district of the Immigration and Naturalization Service."

An investigation of these charges was made that winter, and the Department of Justice, faced by the evidence unearthed, was forced to take action on the charges, which was done by the serving of the warrant on March 5. This investigation, according to the Department of Labor release, was "a thorough investigation of the new evidence."

The charges made against Bridges both in 1934 and in 1937 were based upon his activities as a Communist or a labor leader engaged in communistic activities.

Subsequent investigation of the Bridges case, however, has brought to light matter which has formed the basis of other charges which are expected to be brought against Bridges if and when his hearing is ever allowed by the Department of Labor. These charges have to do with his alleged falsification in his oaths taken with filing of his papers to seek citizenship. The alleged false statements have to do with the marital status of Bridges and are supported by further evidence of alleged violation of the Immigration Act.

Emphasis is placed upon the marital history of Bridges because of the clause in the United States immigration law which says, in section 80 of the act of 1900, "Whoever, in any proceeding under or by virtue of any law relating to the naturalization of aliens, shall knowingly swear falsely in any case where an oath is made or affidavit taken shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than 5 years" (35 Stat. 1103; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 142).

The law also stated that "No alien shall be admitted to citizenship unless (2) he has resided continuously within the United States from the date of his petition up to the time of his admission to citizenship and (3) during all the periods herein referred to he has behaved as a person of good moral character, attached to the principle of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed in good order and happiness of the United States."

Bridges has allegedly violated both these clauses of the act—first, by not behaving "as a person of good moral character," and, secondly, by swearing to false statements.

Records on file in the Department of Labor show that Bridges came to the United States and registered as an alien on May 7, 1920. He went to work as a longshoreman in his port of entry, San Francisco. He soon went to New Orleans, La., where, on July 13, 1921, he filed his first papers for application for American citizenship. He failed, however, to perfect his citizenship within the 7 years required by law.

On August 9, 1928, less than a month after the expiration of his first period of application, he again filed first papers, this time making his declarations before the clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California. He stated at this time, under oath, that he was married and that the name of his wife was Agnes, and that she was born in Scotland, and that they were at that time living together.

Again Bridges failed to perfect his citizenship within the required 7 years. He filled out form A–2213, however, which is entitled "Preliminary Form for a Declaration of Intention." This form was signed on May 2, 1936. It is now on record in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California.

In this form filed in 1936 Bridges declared that he was married; that his wife's name was Agnes; that she was born in Glasgow, Scotland; that they were married on May 1, 1934, at San Francisco; and that they had two children, whose names were Kenneth McCley, born July 27, 1916, at Marshfield, Oreg., and Betty Jacqueline Bridges, born December 26, 1924, at San Francisco.

In an attempt to clarify the apparently conflicting statements filed by Bridges relative to his marital status, an examination was made by Immigration Inspector Thomas V. Donoghue, who on January 22, 1935, filed his report with the district director at San Francisco. In his report Inspector Donoghue stated that the records of papers filed by Bridges in 1928 show that Bridges related, under oath, that he had been married on December 2, 1923, under the name of Harry Renton Bridges; that his wife was Agnes Bridges; and that he had a child, Betty Bridges, born December 26, 1924, in San Francisco, at which time his residence was at 37 Altha Street, in that city.

Inspector Donoghue states further that he checked the records in San Francisco and found no record of such birth. Neither did he find a record of any such marriage. He later had a check made of the whole State and found no record of any such marriage.

A subsequent investigation was made by Immigration Inspector M. C. Pommerane, who stated that he went to Marshfield, Oreg., to investigate the former status of Agnes Bridges (nee Brown), "the present wife or consort of Harry Bridges."

He states that he obtained information that she had been formerly married to a Walter Moore, then living at 2055 Harrison Street, North Bend, Oreg., and that they had been married on May 26, 1917, had one child, and had been subsequently divorced on June 20, 1923.

Raphael P. Bonham, district immigration director at Seattle, Wash., stated that the reason Bridges filed his second application of intention in 1928 so soon after the lapse of the first declaration at the end of the 7 years was that "he did not dare to apply for naturalization in view of the fact of being the father of a 4-year-old child to whose mother he was not at the time married. It is understood that he was convinced that naturalization would be refused, but that he believed that by filing a new application of intention, with a period of 7 additional years in which to straighten out his domestic situation, he would be able to proceed with his naturalization."

Affirmation of these records by the northern district of California court follows: "Harry Renton Bridges made declaration of intention August 9, 1928, showing Agnes Bridges as his wife. The record did not show marriage date but did state that his wife was born in Scotland. In his preliminary form for declaration, filed May 2, 1936, Bridges stated that he married Agnes on May 1, 1934, at San Francisco."

On December 19, 1938, the State registrar of vital statistics of the State of California filed a statement as follows: "There is no record in California of Harry Renton Bridges and Agnes Brown (or McCley) having been married either on December 2, 1923, or May 1, 1934, nor on any other date between July 1905 and June 30, 1938."

A further search was made by the State registrar, and a further statement was made to the effect that Harry Renton Bridges had never been married to anyone within the State of California.

The evidence shows, therefore, that Bridges has filed separate statements in which he gives two dates, 11 years apart, upon which his marriage took place; that in one instance he admits to having two children, and in another place, under oath, he states that he has had one child; and that no record of any such marriage can be found in the State of California.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include therein an editorial from the Southwestern American on Education in the South.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next I may have the right to address the House for 25 minutes, after the disposition of the legislative business of the day and any other special orders that may have been entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution, House Resolution 436.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 436

Resolved, That notwithstanding the provisions of clause 2, rule XXI, it shall be in order to consider, without the intervention of any point of order, in connection with the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, the appropriation and language providing for the National Youth Administration for such fiscal year.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it seems to be the general opinion that there is no opposition to this provision, in order to save time, I wonder whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] will want any time on the rule.

Mr. FISH. Yes; I want all of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will yield 30 minutes, after I have concluded, to the gentleman from New York on this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, this rule was made necessary because a gentleman gave notice that he proposed to raise a point of order against some provisions in the pending bill.

All this rule does is to waive those points of order so that the recommendations and action of the Committee on Appropriations may be brought before the House for its consideration.

As far as I can learn, there is no opposition to these appropriations. I am informed by Members who have given a great deal of study to this matter, who have had witnesses before them, that they are all of one opinion, namely, that there is no agency that has done more good for the youth of America than the National Youth Administration. The amount of the proposed appropriation is not extremely large. I feel that if the membership of this House were as well informed as the chairman and members of the subcommittee and the entire Committee on Appropriations, there would not be a half dozen votes cast against any of these provisions. The good work that has been done by this worthy agency for the youth of America is listed in the most beneficial and constructive work of this administration. The youth of America have been given a merited opportunity for schooling; those who can least afford schooling have had an opportunity to finish their education in high schools and, in some instances, in colleges. That is especially true in the rural sections of the country. They have helped build schools, bridges, highways, parks, streets, and other public works, all beneficial to local communities, at the smallest possible expense to the Government. After you have had an opportunity to hear the extremely efficient and able chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. TARVER], I know there will be no question in the minds of any of you that each and every provision in that section of the bill should receive favorable action.

The only objection that has been raised by two or three Members is against the gentleman, Mr. Aubrey Williams, in charge of that constructive, monumental work; but again I want to say that I have had the pleasure and honor of meeting and knowing a great many real, upstanding Americans; and I do not know anybody who is more sincere, loyal, devoted, and patriotic than the gentleman who is in charge of this splendid work. True, it is said he is a little too ambitious; he is a little too progressive; but this is a work of such magnitude and importance to the Nation that each and every one of you would perhaps be as intensely interested as he, if you had been called upon to perform the gratifying service he has performed.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. No; not just now.

Of course, the gentleman does not need any defense from me. He has appeared before several congressional committees and has been questioned thoroughly and frequently. I give you my word of honor, repeating, that I do not know of a greater patriot, a more sincere man, a man who possesses greater ability in his particular field than the very gentleman who, I am informed, will be attacked by the gentleman on my left. I think that attack upon a man who has accomplished so much as Mr. Williams is unwarranted unjustifiable, and unfair.

I purpose, later, to insert in my remarks a biographical sketch of Mr. Williams, which I know will put anybody who attacks him to lasting shame.

You know it is easy to assail and attack a man who cannot here answer; but I know that the gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER, in whom we all have thorough confidence, will satisfy you that, although Mr. Williams has been subjected to thorough and searching examination and cross-examination, he answered every question propounded to him not only to the satisfaction of the chairman, but to the satisfaction of the entire membership of the subcommittee.

These appropriations have been unanimously reported by the subcommittee and approved by the entire committee. I do not know whether they were reported unanimously by the 40 members of the Committee on Appropriations or not. Therefore, I hope that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], today, at least, especially in view of the prominence which he has attained in the last few months in connection with his candidacy for President, will forego his unjustifiable attack upon a man who is not privileged to occupy the floor to answer.

As I know the gentleman from New York, he seems always to suffer with a prejudice obsession against any new dealer. He has admitted many times privately that most of the New Deal activities, including the National Youth Administration, have been a great benefit to the Nation; and while on the floor of the House, for political reasons, he attacks those selfsame activities, thus far I have failed to hear him advocate the repeal of any of those activities.

In this instance, not being able successfully to criticize President Roosevelt's wise policy in creating the National Youth Administration, he vents his spleen upon the man the President chose to lead this important work.

Notwithstanding the prejudice of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], I feel that, if he knew Mr. Williams as well as those who come in intimate contact with him, he would forego his contemplated unjustifiable and unwarranted remarks about Mr. Williams.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman made the statement that this amount was not large. What amount did the gentleman refer to?

Mr. SABATH. The amount provided in this bill for the National Youth Administration. The amount in the bill is $79,635,000 and that will take care of millions of youth all over the United States.

Mr. RICH. The point I want to make is that the gentleman states that $79,000,000 is not a large amount.

Mr. SABATH. Taking everything into consideration, the real good that has been and is being accomplished for our youth, I do not think it is a great amount.

May I remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] of the constructive benefits that accrue to local communities from the N. Y. A. They are:

First. To provide part-time employment for needy young persons in schools, colleges, and universities to enable such persons to continue their education.

Second. To provide employment and training for unemployed young persons on public projects of the following types:

The construction, improvement, and repair of non-Federal public buildings and grounds, parks, and other recreational facilities; bridges, highways, roads, streets, and alleys; airports and airway facilities; water and sanitation facilities; facilities for conservation; irrigation and flood control; pest eradication; and work on all other non-Federal public facilities including cooperative associations receiving financial assistance from the Rural Electrification Administration, or other public agencies.

Surely the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not deny that this will be money expended in the right direction. It will confer very great and permanent improvement to all America.

Mr. RICH. The only difficulty is that there are so many of these amounts which we are told are not large, do not amount to much, yet added together make a staggering total. How about the Democratic deficit, is that large?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; but I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that our Federal revenues are increasing rapidly because business is improving steadily; as shown by a report of March 15, 1940. In view of improving business conditions, the amount is not large, because if we continue to improve as we have, I know that the Federal revenues will safely permit such appropriations.

Mr. RICH. The income-tax receipts for last year are 30 percent more than they were the year before, but look at the deficit. It is a great deal more now than it was at a corresponding time last year and it will be $4,000,000,000 before the end of the year. Where are we going to get that money? [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. That is the gentleman's stock question. He asks it practically every day. I will answer by saying that if Republican industrialists and financiers will not continue to willfully and deliberately retard the worthy and unselfish efforts of the administration we will in 1940—certainly if we are to be successful in drafting President Roosevelt for a third term, as the country strongly demands, I am as sure as I am sure I am standing on the floor of this House—see a national income of close to the $80,000,000,000 mark. Therefore, I feel that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] need not be alarmed as to the source of money to meet worthy governmental operations, and if the Government succeeds in reaching all the large income-tax evasionists there will be no Federal deficit in the next fiscal year notwithstanding the daily hue and cry against taxes. Taxes here are far below those imposed by every other major country of the world.

The gentleman must concede, whether he likes it or not, that the Government credit is better today than it ever has been in the history of America. The Government is getting funds at lower interest rates than ever before in history, frequently at one-fourth of 1 percent for short-term and 2¼ percent for long-term loans, whereas the rates under Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover were more than double those. This shows that the financiers of the world have thorough confidence in President Roosevelt's administration policy and program and what they have accomplished.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. I think my colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, might be in error in the figure $79,000,000. I believe the committee voted N. Y. A. $85,000,000.

Mr. SABATH. The bill shows $79,635,000.

Mr. STEFAN. My understanding all along has been that it was $85,000,000.

Mr. SABATH. I can go only by the figures in the bill.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations handling the bill.

Mr. TARVER. The total amount carried in the bill for N. Y. A. appropriation is $85,000,000. The figure the gentleman cited is the amount exclusive of administrative expenses.

Mr. SABATH. I stand corrected, and thank the gentleman from Nebraska for calling it to my attention.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any objection on the minority side to the rule; nor do I believe there is much objection to the amount carried in the bill for the National Youth Administration. There are those on the minority side, however, who seriously question the qualifications of Aubrey Williams to head this very important unit of the Federal service, the National Youth Administration.

I did not, as the gentleman from Illinois suggested, rise to attack Mr. Williams. I do not know him personally. I have never met him, I have had no contact with him whatsoever. All I know about Mr. Williams is what he has said himself, as quoted in the public press, and that is the only way or reason I have any right whatever to judge him.

Two years ago, during a congressional campaign, Mr. Williams said this in addressing a group of the Workers Alliance, a Communist-led organization:

> We have to stick together; we have got to keep our friends in power.

Those words were used for the purpose of defeating Jeffersonian and constitutional Democrats in 1938, of purging these Democrats because they had the temerity or the courage to stand for their own convictions and exercise their constitutional right of freedom of speech and freedom of conscience. Mr. Williams, the head of a Federal Government service, went before a group which was receiving Government aid and asked their support to drive out of the Democratic Party men like Congressman John O'Connor, of New York, and others who had served in the House and Senate honorably and well and stood steadfastly for the great principles of the Democratic Party for many years in the Congress. A public official who makes that kind of statement and uses such political tactics and turns human misery into a political football is not, in my opinion, qualified to head this particular branch of the Government service. That is not the only inflamatory statement he has made.

In December of the same year in speaking to a group in Birmingham, Ala., he said:

> I am not sure that class warfare is not all right.

I do not believe that represents the viewpoint of the Democratic Party. It certainly does not represent the viewpoint of the Democratic Members elected by the people to the House of Representatives. Yet those are the words of this man Aubrey Williams—

> I am not sure that class warfare is not all right.

Do you seriously think that is the proper kind of a doctrine to teach the youth of America? He has charge of the expenditure of $85,000,000. What assurances have we that he will not continue to use such language and teach class hatred in addressing the oncoming generations of America? What assurances have we that he will not again in this campaign year, this Presidential year, turn to the Workers Alliance and again make it a political football, asking the support of those upon relief and, under the National Youth Administration, to vote for this party or that party or this candidate or that candidate? It is an amazing, shocking, and un-American practice to influence and coerce American citizens on relief by public officials who control relief or educational funds.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Has the gentleman ever asked Mr. Williams whether he did say those things credited to him, and has he ever inquired as to what the impact of Mr. Williams' influence was?

Mr. FISH. I certainly have investigated what Mr. Williams said. I have not telephoned or talked to Mr. Williams, but I have read in the press what he said about it. I have read what the Workers' Alliance stenographer said about it. There seems to be no question as to the words actually used and quoted in the public press. I read what Mr. Dies said about it, and I read what Mr. Williams said and what the press said. I have come to the definite conclusion that no one has actually denied those words, not even Mr. Williams. He may put a different interpretation on them, but I do not think Mr. Williams himself has ever denied those words, particularly the words "I am not sure that class warfare is not all right." I do not believe that even the chairman of the Committee on Rules would want any public official to make any such argument before the youth of America.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Mr. Williams served overseas, just like the gentleman did, in the World War?

Mr. FISH. I am not saying anything against Mr. Williams' character. I am only quoting his own words. From what I read of his biography, I know he served overseas, and I agree that ought to be in his favor. I believe he graduated from some college of intellectual culture and training. He is a highly intelligent man. I am not sure, however, that some of these ultraintelligent public officials are not more dangerous than the out-and-out Communists who have never had the advantage of that training.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 4 additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that these pinks and these radicals holding high public offices are not much more dangerous than the "reds." I never said Mr. Williams was a Communist, and I do not propose to do so; but, interpreting his remarks, I think he is one of the most radical men in the country; he is one of the pinkest of the pink. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] says he is a little too progressive, possibly, but it is not a question of being too progressive. It certainly is not a form of liberalism or progressivism when you make use of voters on relief to purge legislators for expressing their own beliefs. That is not liberalism. That is the denial and repudiation of liberalism. [Applause.] Liberalism is the right of the people and public officials to speak their own minds and is likewise the extension of democracy; the right of the people to rule under our free institutions and not be coerced by relief moneys used for campaign purposes.

Mr. SABATH. That is what he advocates.

Mr. FISH. I do not think Mr. Williams is liberal in any respect whatever. I think he is one of the most radical men in the country, and that is why I am fearful if he should continue to head the National Youth Administration and deal with the youth of America.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Did Mr. Williams appear before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. FISH. No; Mr. Williams did not appear before the Rules Committee. I have not said anything against Mr. Williams, I assure the gentleman, except I used his own words, and I went as far as to investigate those quotations. I am absolutely convinced those were the exact words he uttered.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman should have gotten in touch with him and found out if those words were true or not.

Mr. FISH. I am not required to look up everything I read in the newspaper. I admit that sometimes newspapers are wrong. But I did look into this case and I found, in checking all along the line, that there was no question as to what he said. He merely put another interpretation on it. I have the right to criticize those remarks and would do so whether made by a Republican, a Democrat, or a radical. From a reading of these remarks I am convinced that he is a radical and a pink, and one of the pinkest of this pink New Deal administration, and should not be permitted to teach these kinds of doctrines and class hatred to the youth of America. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am supporting this rule and I shall support the provision of the bill which it is intended to save from a point of order. I want to say, however, that the committee reporting the rule did so with considerable misgivings. I do not believe there are three members of that committee who are entirely satisfied with the philosophy of Mr. Williams, who heads the National Youth Administration.

I have not taken the floor for the purpose of attacking Mr. Williams, but may I say that there has been considerable lobbying among the membership of this House, as most of you know, in an effort to build up sentiment in support of Mr. Williams. I do not like his tying up the National Youth Administration with one Leopold Stokowski, an admitted Communist. I do not like his cooperating with this Communist in building up a musical organization for the purpose of conducting concerts throughout the land.

At a supplemental meeting of the Subcommittee on Appropriations handling this bill, on March 14, there was read into the record a statement taken from the Red Network, a Communist publication, which is as follows:

Stokowski, Leopold: Vice president, American Society for Cultural Relations With Russia; American Committee, World Congress Against War at Amsterdam; wife on executive committee, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; national committee, Workers' International Relief; American Committee for Struggle Against War; conductor, Philadelphia Orchestra since 1912; speaker at Lenin memorial meeting at Broadmoor Hotel, Philadelphia, January 19, 1934, on his symphony Ode to Lenin played at this meeting; Ella R. Bloor, Max Bedacht, and other Communists, fellow speakers; announced he would play the Communist Internationale at Philadelphia Symphony concerts in spite of American Legion protests.

After that paragraph was read into the record the gentleman from Georgia, Hon. MALCOLM C. TARVER, chairman of the subcommittee, took up the questioning of Hon. Aubrey Williams, head of the National Youth Administration, who admitted that the Administration, without an approved project, had gone about conducting the auditions over the country and charged the expenses to administrative expenses.

Mr. TARVER asked this question:

How about the expenses of your press releases?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would have to be included. We have paid travel for some auditionists. We have secured at about 15 local points local auditioners to hold these auditions, but I am not sure we paid for their services.

Mr. TARVER. What did you pay for that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would have to check up on that. I think we paid only travel costs and the usual $5 per diem for those who had to travel.

Mr. TARVER then asked this question:

For what period of time will they [the musicians] have employment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Stokowski thinks it will be very likely that these young people will have permanent employment.

This Communist collected his organization from the ranks of the National Youth Administration.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Continuing, Mr. Williams said:

It is his intention to maintain this orchestra continuously after the tour.

Mr. Williams then explained, in answer to questions, that he was cooperating with the State Department in the matter of this orchestra "in cooperation with the cultural program recently inaugurated by the State Department in Latin America."

Mr. TARVER then asked this question:

Whatever may have been your authority for the present fiscal year, it seems, from this language—

That is, in the 1941 bill—that you probably could not institute such a project under the language proposed for that appropriation for the next fiscal year.

Mr. Williams answered:

Well, Mr. Chairman, let me make this clear. In the first place this is not a project. We employed no youth and we have no supervisors, and in no sense of the word is this a project of the National Youth Administration. It falls under the category, as far as our authority to spend money is concerned, of general administrative expenses, and I take it that is a part of the general enabling provisions of the legislation; that that is what the Youth Administration is set up to do.

Mr. TARVER. Well, there is no general enabling act. It is simply a provision in the relief bill; there is no statutory authority for the National Youth Administration at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I meant was it comes under our general administrative authority.

Mr. TARVER then asked whether there was any possibility of the continuance of such an activity, and Mr. Williams replied:

Well, Judge TARVER, the only manner in which I can answer that is to say I have considered it legitimate to expend money to help young people find employment. Now, if there is no language in here to cover that, then I have been amiss in spending the money.

Thereupon, it was developed that the National Youth had set up 180 employment offices, the expenses of which, amounting to $629,527 from June 1935 to March 1940, had been likewise charged to "Administrative expenses" appropriated for the National Youth Administration.

So, again Mr. Speaker, let me say that, while I am supporting the rule and shall support the bill, I want to say to you that the committee reporting this rule entertained grave misgivings about letting this activity continue under the supervision and control of Mr. Aubrey Williams. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, I believe the temptation is present at a time such as this to exaggerate. I shall try to avoid indulging in the exaggeration that I feel characterized the statements of our distinguished colleague from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Rules. It seems to me that Mr. Williams might have appeared in a better light this morning had the distinguished gentleman from Illinois not felt called upon to prepare such an exhaustive and exaggerated statement of defense of Mr. Williams' patriotism and other qualifications. I shall endeavor to be temperate as I make this observation about the man.

I believe Mr. Williams has a right to think what he will. I believe that in his own individual life he can indulge in whatever opinions he sees fit. To my mind, the very essence of democracy is the spirit of tolerance, and that spirit of tolerance prompts me to say that Mr. Williams has that inherent right.

However, when Mr. Williams takes over the administration of an activity such as the National Youth Administration, then it seems to me he is charged with an entirely different type of responsibility; then it seems to me the public has a right to inquire into his views, his attitude, and the fundamental philosophy behind the man. I believe we can grasp that fundamental philosophy in no better way than to observe those ideas and beliefs to which he gives expression.

Mr. Williams is charged with the activity of looking after the young people of America, and that is a serious responsibility. I believe there is no more serious part of that responsibility than that which gives to the young people hope and an optimistic outlook.

As I think of his responsibility as such a leader, I am reminded of a statement made by Mr. Williams in 1936. And, mark you, this statement in 1936 was at a time when the political campaign was at its height, and certainly at a time when Mr. Williams should have been guarded in his statements.

If this National Youth Administration is to be divorced from the taint of partisan politics, I believe Mr. Williams should first impress the country with the thought that there is no partisanship in dealing with the youth movement. Here is the statement he made:

Thousands of young men and women leaving our schools each year are destined never to become self-supporting and independent in the sense that your and my generation was led to believe was our due. * * * The productive forces of this country are glutted with brain and brawn which they cannot use. And what can't be utilized is simply laid aside to molder and decay.

Now, I challenge the Democratic group to say whether or not they want a man holding such views to be the inspiration of the youth movement that this administration is sponsoring; a man who carries the thought to the mothers and the fathers of America that we will let the ability, the enthusiasm, the energy, the initiative, and the ambition of our young people molder and decay.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 more minute.

Mr. DITTER. I am not speaking of Williams as a Communist. I am letting his own expressions, that have already been referred to, decide that matter; but I am asking in all seriousness today whether a man who has the outlook that the talents of our young people have a destiny only to molder and decay can bring an inspiration to the youth of America which will assure us that our young citizens of tomorrow will be what you and I hope they will be. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for the continuation of one of the organizations set up by the present administration. I cannot help but think of the statements made in 1932 by the present occupant of the White House, before he took office. I recall how he criticized the previous administration for having so many bureaus and how he criticized the administration of the Government from the standpoint of expenditures; how he criticized everything that was going on at the time of his election because of the fact there was too much Government operation and not enough consolidation and not enough simplicity in government. However, let me call your attention to the fact that since Mr. Roosevelt has taken office he has established more bureaus, he has put more people on the Government pay roll than any other President that ever came to Washington. He has set up more new departments. He criticized these very things previous to this administration, but he wants to establish the very bureaus and do the very things that he then criticized. I wonder what the people of this country can think of a man who has so completely turned a back somersault from the teachings he expounded to the American people before he was elected President. It seems to me that something, somehow, somewhere, has converted him and caused him to do just exactly the opposite thing from what he said he would do. Was it the college professors he brought to Washington; who was it?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I have only 3 minutes and I cannot yield.

Now, what has been the result? I showed you a few moments ago when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] had the floor where he said that $85,000,000 is not a very large sum. This has been the trouble with the Congress in the past 7 or 8 years; a million dollars, a billion dollars, or any sum up to four or five billion dollars is not a very large sum with this Congress. When Mr. Roosevelt asked for the first appropriation of $4,880,000,000, it was the worst thing Congress ever did to a President of the United States in placing that power for the expenditure of such great sums of money in the hands of those who could go out and squander it and lavish it on things he or they did not know anything about. It was just like a rich man's son inheriting a lot of money. When he starts to spend he does not spend judiciously or on worthwhile projects, but just squanders it, has wasted it. So what do we have today with respect to the youth of America who are coming on now to assume this administration's responsibilities? The youth of this country will have to pay for this administration's folly. We have an agency set up by the President of the United States engaged in this great spending and squandering spree. The relief should be returned to the local communities.

Mr. Roosevelt has received 43 percent of all the receipts or moneys collected from the time of George Washington. Under Mr. Roosevelt's administration he has spent 58 percent of all the receipts from the time of George Washington up until today. A terrible unbusinesslike procedure. The deficit created by Mr. Roosevelt since he came to Washington is 100 percent greater than what it was when he took office. Think of conditions of that kind which the youth of America have to face, and that is what we are talking about today—the youth of America. We must consider what they are going to face. You can now give them any sum of money you want, but how are you going to give them the fortitude to stand up and meet the obligations that this administration has placed upon them. It seems a crime to American civilization when we think of such a procedure as the one we are going through these days. [Applause.]

I am interested in the youth of America, but I do not believe in continuing an Executive order by legislation such as we are trying to do if this rule is adopted and I shall oppose the principle by my vote on this rule. Let us legislate in the proper and right way; do not adopt by such a rule an Executive order to be continued as an appropriation bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], chairman of the subcommittee having the bill in charge.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is regrettable that the consideration of this rule should be made the vehicle for an attack on Aubrey Williams. The only purpose for the consideration of the rule by the House is to determine whether or not certain provisions for the N. Y. A. shall be made in order. It has been stated by gentlemen on the minority side that they do not object to the adoption of the rule. Therefore, the only purpose of the argument today has been an attack on the character of the man who is at the head of the National Youth Administration. I think that attack has been patently unfair, and I shall give you the reasons which lead me to that conclusion. In doing so I state that I hold no brief for Aubrey Williams. I think I never saw him more than two or three times prior to the time that he appeared as a witness before our subcommittee. He comes from the State of Alabama, adjoining the State in which I live. I have been impressed by his evidence before the committee, by his appearance, by the work which he has accomplished, with the idea that he is a very sincere man, a man who is in the pursuit of the achievement of a great objective, and one which has much to do with the welfare and the saving of several millions of underprivileged American youths, and so far as I am concerned, I want to aid him in the achievement of that objective. If there are things which he has done which are improper, then he ought to be restricted in his further operations, and our subcommittee, feeling that some of the things which have been done were not in accordance with the best interests of this program, have sought to include in the bill certain restrictions which would be restrictive in the further prosecution of the program.

I said that these attacks made on him this morning are unfair. They are made at a time when he does not have the privilege of answering. Furthermore, there is no evidence here, with the exception of one feature of these attacks, that the charges have ever been called to his attention, so that he might have an opportunity to reply. I do give the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] credit for having appeared before our subcommittee, and laid before us the facts as they have been brought to his knowledge with reference to the Stokowski Band. The committee went into that matter very thoroughly as it went into all other matters affecting the carrying on of the work of the National Youth Administration, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] gave this man an opportunity to be heard, and we did hear him. We had him present when the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] testified, and we had his evidence, as you will observe from the published hearings. These charges made this morning are made by gentlemen who undoubtedly knew our subcommitee was in session for more than a month, who knew that in the course of our investigations we would consider the operations of the National Youth Administration in their every detail, and who knew that we would have been glad to hear them before our subcommittee if they had intimated that they had a desire to be heard, but they did not come before us and make the charges at a time when Mr. Williams might have had an opportunity to either deny or confirm them. They came to the floor of the House and made the charges, as far as I am advised, for the first time today. For what purpose? I do not know, but I think the membership of the House can for themselves conceive the purpose with which the charges are advanced.

Is Aubrey Williams a Communist? There is no justification for the charge that he is. Let me read to you what he says about it.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I cannot yield at this time. I shall read to you from page 608 of volume 2 of the hearings, and I would be glad if you would get that page of the hearings and read for yourselves. We went into this matter of whether he had Communistic leanings. I read from the hearings:

Mr. TARVER. Right on that let me ask you: You would not employ as one of the supervisors of your program or in any other capacity in connection with your program anyone who belonged to any of those commonly known as subversive groups, such as the Communist Party, would you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not knowingly have anybody employed that is a Communist.

Mr. TARVER. Well, would you employ anybody who was one?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I would not.

Mr. TARVER. You don't entertain the idea that any American citizen has the right to advocate the destruction of the Government or the form of government by force or violence?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. I am completely opposed to it.

Mr. TARVER. He has the right to advocate such method of changing the Government as he may think proper by constitutional mean.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By constitutional means.

Then Mr. Williams continued—and I want gentlemen to listen to this, and if it does not contain good American doctrine, then I have never heard such. He says:

I ask all of those people who work for the Youth Administration to be loyal to and adhere to the American form of government. I take it very seriously that this organization has a responsibility in regard to young people with respect to their attitude toward the Government. That responsibility, in my mind, rests upon and is in terms of the best traditions of American life and living; it rests in the terms of Jefferson and of Lincoln and of all of those other men who have tried to teach us what real democracy means, and not in terms of a narrow or bigoted or extremist position, either this or that or the other.

Is there anyone present who finds fault with the doctrine of Americanism as announced by Mr. Williams in those words? Oh, they say, that this man Stokowski, who is going to carry on this all-American youth-band venture, is a Communist. I do not know whether he is or not. The charge was not insisted upon before our subcommittee, and there is no evidence now, and never has been, that Mr. Williams knew anything about Stokowski having been accused of communism. What did he do? He never financed Mr. Stokowski's venture. The American Government will not pay out one cent toward the expenses of the tour which is proposed. It did not charter the ship. It will not pay a cent of the wages which will be paid to the young men who have been or will be selected for that trip. What did Mr. Williams do that he should be so severely excoriated this morning? He spent about $2,600 holding auditions in all parts of the United States in order to select competent young people who might be employed in that band; in other words, in order to secure employment for them.

In addition to the 109 who secured employment, there were 10,000, in his opinion, who will be able to secure employment from others than Stokowski because of the benefit of the discovery of their talents brought about by the holding of these auditions. Is that too much to spend—$2,600?

Of course, the committee in its report has indicated that it does not think that is a proper activity of the National Youth Administration, and has placed restrictions in the bill accordingly.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Is this the first day the gentleman has heard Mr. Williams referred to as a Communist?

Mr. TARVER. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Then, why did the gentleman not inquire into it when he had the opportunity?

Mr. TARVER. If the gentleman will take the trouble to read the hearings, the very page of the hearings which I cited, page 608, which he evidently has not looked at, although I requested him to do it, he would find that the committee went thoroughly into the question of whether or not Mr. Williams is a Communist. I think we arrived unanimously at the conclusion, including the two gentlemen who served on the committee from the gentleman's side of the aisle, that there is not the suggestion of a reason to believe that Mr. Williams is a Communist or that he has communistic tendencies.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I understand this rule will be in the nature of an authorization for the National Youth Administration appropriation as proposed in the pending bill?

Mr. TARVER. No. The gentleman is misinformed. The only effect of the rule will be to allow the House to consider the appropriation just as in the relief bill last year and the year before. There was a rule for it then, and there is a rule for this now. It is simply to allow you to consider it. If you want to cut it down or raise it or cut it out, then that is within your power, notwithstanding the adoption of the rule.

Mr. MAY. What I intended to bring out was that I have had a letter from at least one Member of the House who says he proposes to raise the amount from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000, and asked me to support that raise. If this rule is passed, then it will be open for all of those things?

Mr. TARVER. Certainly. While I am very much interested in the work of the National Youth Administration, I hope the House will not increase the amount. The committee has given the full Budget estimate which I think is proper, but Members have the right to offer amendments to raise or increase the amount if they desire to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] such time as he may desire.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I fail to see any logical argument against the adoption of the rule which will make in order any amount or the amount contained in the bill. Certainly the opposition to American youth will not be so violent and uncompromising as to deny the House the right to consider the matter.

As for myself, I want it clearly understood that I will insist upon $100,000,000 for N. Y. A. A year ago I stood with a small group of progressive Members who insisted upon the restoration of the original $125,000,000 figure which was cut in twain. We were not successful, I am sorry to say, but we did bring the figure to $100,000,000 and that is the minimum that I feel I can compromise upon. The service of the N. Y. A. to American youth, under the direction of Aubrey Williams, can never be fully appraised or appreciated. These personal attacks are mere smoke screens and red herrings drawn across the history-making trail of the N. Y. A. which will prove ineffective and will not prevent adoption of the rule. The great majority of this House will vote for a liberalized amount because the welfare of American youth demands such action. If the roll is called there will be many desertions from the opposition. Consideration of the enlarged amount question can be brought before the membership and they will, I am certain, act to increase the amount. The limitation of time prevents me from touching upon the specific points of merit which should incline Members to vote for the rule and later for a substantial increase in the appropriation.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I am probably a lone voice crying in the wilderness, but I am opposed to this rule. I am opposed to it because I believe that the Congress of the United States and the Government of the United States have a responsibility to the young men and young women of today, who will be the grown men and grown women of tomorrow, who in the future will have to carry the load of American citizenship. I do not believe that the management of the National Youth Administration has been such that it is proper to continue that kind of an operation. If for some reason or other some of the activities of that organization should be carried on, in my humble opinion they should be set up in such way that a different type of administrator should have charge of it.

At this time I am going to refer briefly to some of the things that have happened. Mr. Williams, appearing before the Workers Alliance in 1938, said:

> Now there are a lot of things I would like to say to you when all is said and done. I would look back on the hours spent in conference with David Lasser, Herbert Benjamin, Morris Watson, and other representatives of the unemployed and W. P. A. workers as the high spots in my life in Washington.

That organization was shown to be a communistic organization, in the hearings before the W. P. A. Investigating Committee.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. I asked a question awhile ago of my colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] which he answered by saying that the committee had been satisfied that Mr. Williams was not a Communist. Will the gentleman kindly answer that as best he can?

Mr. TABER. Yes. He says that he is not a Communist. I am not going to say that he is. At the present time only a few days have elapsed since he discharged 22 who were on his pay roll and who were serving as clerks for the American Youth Congress.

That discharge, as I understand it, was under pressure. You can all remember a few days ago when that congress was in session here, how they booed the President of the United States when he attempted to say something about Americanism and separate them from the heel of Mr. Stalin in Russia. I do not believe that a man who, in my opinion, is ready in violation of the law to spend Government funds to provide clerks for an avowed Communist organization is in the clear.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I might call my friend's attention to the fact that the same organization booed Mr. Williams when he addressed them on that occasion.

Mr. TABER. That might be. I did not have that recollection.

He also is in the process—and I have time here only to go into it in a general way—of turning over 109 American youths to the custody of Mr. Stokowski, of Philadelphia, whose record the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] read a few moments ago. They are planning that gorgeous tour to South America on the luxury liner Washington. Mr. Williams says he is not sponsoring the expense of the tour. In my opinion, it will cost $1,000,000, and I cannot see where the money will come from except the Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 1½ minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Surely no fair-minded man, after reading his statement, can say that Mr. Aubrey Williams is not a man with the highest patriotic leanings for true Americanism. The implications that were made before the Committee on Rules led me to request that Mr. Williams send me a statement and a biographical sketch. I received them this morning and I desire to make them a part of the RECORD. They say:

> FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY,
> NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION,
> Washington, D. C., March 25, 1940.
> The Honorable ADOLPH J. SABATH,
> House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
>
> MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SABATH: The attached biographical sketch is sent you as per your telephone request.
> With regard to the charges in connection with Commonwealth College in Arkansas, my interest in this institution developed out of a recommendation made to me by Mrs. Justice Brandeis some 10 years ago, at which time I contributed $10 to it. Shortly after that the man who was in charge of it left and I have given nothing to the institution since then.

With respect to my relations with the Workers Alliance, I have never had, and do not now have, any connection with them. As Deputy Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, it was my duty to see them and to hear complaints, which I did. I never contributed, nor was I asked to contribute, one penny to their organization.

Sincerely yours,

AUBREY WILLIAMS,
Administrator.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Mr. Aubrey W. Williams is Administrator of the National Youth Administration. His function, of course, as implied in the title, is to administer the business and affairs and policies of this Federal agency. His office is in Washington, and under him, throughout the country, are youth administrators of the National Youth Administration, one for every State, one for the District of Columbia, and one for metropolitan New York. These officials are appointed by Administrator Williams, as well as four regional representatives who are, in effect, field men and liaison officers for the organization.

Mr. Williams was born in Alabama in 1890, in a family impoverished by the Civil War, and grew up in Birmingham, to which city his parents removed when he was but a few months old. He went to work in a laundry at the age of 7, and until he was 20 years of age he did not have what amounted to more than 1 year's formal schooling, having obtained his education on the outside by constant reading, attendance at night school, and tutoring from friends and teachers. While still a young man he manifested a keen interest in social problems and became interested in welfare work, aiding to establish a boys' club in Birmingham before he was 20 years of age.

In 1911, having saved some money, Mr. Williams entered Maryville College, at Maryville, Tenn., with the intention of studying for the ministry, an ambition which he later abandoned in favor of social-service work. He worked his way through Maryville College and entered the University of Cincinnati at about the time the World War broke out in Europe. In 1916 he went to Paris with the Y. M. C. A., continuing his studies there, meanwhile, by attending lectures at the Sorbonne. After a period in the Y. M. C. A. service, Mr. Williams forsook his noncombative role and joined the French Foreign Legion. Upon the arrival of American troops he then effected a transfer to a combat unit of the First Division, and saw active service and was wounded at the front in a field-artillery unit. Later he was sent to a training camp and was commissioned a lieutenant.

Following the armistice he secured a furlough and entered the University of Bordeaux, from which he received a degree in philosophy. He returned to the United States, and for a short time performed the services of a lay preacher in a small community across the Ohio River from Cincinnati. From this work he went to Cincinnati as recreation director for a welfare organization, and from that time on devoted himself to social-welfare activities.

In August 1922 Mr. Williams was called from Cincinnati to Wisconsin as secretary of the Wisconsin Conference of Social Work. While in that position, which dealt with the study and promotion of social legislation, he secured the passage of a Children's Code, the first complete measure of such a nature in the history of legislation in this country. During the same period he also originated and conducted the Wisconsin better-cities contest, the purpose of which was to study and establish the standards of civil and social practice for American municipality.

Mr. Williams remained in this position for a period of 10 years and then joined the staff of the American Public Welfare Association in July 1932. His services were borrowed from time to time by various States, and in the course of this work he organized the Mississippi Relief Administration and, with Col. Lawrence Westbrook, performed the same service for Texas. Both these tasks were undertaken at the request of the respective Governors of the two States.

In June 1933 Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, then Federal Emergency Relief Administrator, summoned Mr. Williams to Washington and appointed him as field representative in the Southwest. He has remained with the Government ever since, eventually becoming Deputy Administrator for the Works Progress Administration, in which capacity he served until appointed full-time Administrator with the National Youth Administration in December 1938.

Mr. Williams' connection with the National Youth Administration began in 1935, when this agency was created by Presidential order, and he was named by President Roosevelt as executive director, holding this office at the same time that he was Deputy Administrator of the Works Progress Administration. In this position he gave the agency his daily and personal attention, organized his set-up, and formulated his policies and projects. In conformity with the first plan on reorganization of the Government, this agency was placed in the Federal Security Agency, which is administering Federal organizations engaged in social security and kindred forms of Federal activity.

Mr. Williams is married and has four boys, aged 18, 16, 15, and 13. He resides in Arlington County, Va.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the unjustifiable and unwarranted attack on Mr. Aubrey Williams, the head of the National Youth Administration, against whose efficiency, honesty, and integrity no one is able to truthfully and accurately say a single word or question in any respect, I must charge that it is only done solely for political purposes by the Republicans of this House. It is a matter of keen regret that my colleague from Georgia [Mr. COX], while everyone admits that there is no real foundation for charging Mr. Williams with being a Communist or being affiliated with communistic activities, should join with the Republicans in questioning the patriotism, fitness, and ability of Mr. Williams to serve as the Director of this great organization. Cleverly, the opposition points to a speech he made in 1934, and to another in 1936, when he was Deputy Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, advocating in substance that the W. P. A. workers and the other American wage earners lend their support to the policies of this administration. Both gentlemen from New York [Mr. FISH and Mr. TABER] read from newspaper clippings of that time, admitting, however, that they never inquired of Mr. Williams as to or obtained any substantiation elsewhere of the authenticity of his alleged remarks.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] has cited and referred to Mr. Williams' testimony before the Subcommittee on Appropriations. Please read and carefully consider Mr. Williams' answers to the interrogatories of the gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER. They appeal to me so strongly that I am embodying them as part of my remarks. They say:

Mr. TARVER. You don't entertain the idea that any American citizen has the right to advocate the destruction of the Government or the form of government by force or violence?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. I am completely opposed to it.

Mr. TARVER. He has the right to advocate such method of changing the Government as he may think proper by constitutional means.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By constitutional means.

And I have taken this position all the time: That I never have and would not now employ knowingly a Communist to be a supervisor of any project, or, for that matter, any other part of our organization.

But I wouldn't want that to be construed as saying that when people get up and raise a hue and cry that this man is a Communist, that I am willing to fire him right off because somebody calls him a Communist; because I am not, for that is a term that has been bandied around generally.

Let me go ahead for a moment.

I ask all of those people who work for the Youth Administration to be loyal to and adhere to the American form of government. I take it very seriously that this organization has a responsibility in regard to young people with respect to their attitude toward the Government. That responsibility, in my mind, rests upon and is in terms of the best traditions of American life and living; it rests in the terms of Jefferson and of Lincoln and of all of those other men who have tried to teach us what real democracy means, and not in terms of a narrow or bigoted or extremist position, either this or that or the other.

Mr. Speaker, it is therefore clear to me that those Republicans who charge Mr. Williams with trying to influence some W. P. A. workers—to which I cannot conceive any possible real objection—do so only in an attempt to make political capital.

Mr. Speaker, failing in their efforts to successfully attack the patriotism and true Americanism of Mr. Aubrey Williams, the opposition assail Leopold Stokowski, leader of the Philadelphia Symphony, who, in the interest of American youth, is arranging a South American concert tour, without cost to the Government. They attempt to show that he played some Russian compositions at a time when we had friendly relations with that country. They allude to a protest of an American Legion post. I wonder how many members of that post possess such talents as to justify their passing judgment upon the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. And because of that rendition we hear political-minded Members today attempting to label Stokowski as a "red." Who are the men serving on the board of directors of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Stokowski? Every one of them is well known as an outstanding American citizen, and surely they and the good people of Philadelphia would not continue to honor this great artist if he were a Communist or in any way connected with any communistic activities. But what do the Republican mouthpieces on the floor of this House care, so long as they can create some publicity in the antagonistic Republican press?

Mr. Speaker, as has been stated, the South American tour is privately sponsored. The following outstanding American citizens are members of the executive committee: Mrs. Samuel Lyle Conner, Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C.; Dr. L. S. Rowe, director general, Pan American Union; Mr. Colby Chester, president, General Foods; Mr. Thomas McInnerney, president, National Dairy Products; Mr. William S. Paley, president, Columbia Broadcasting System; Mr. Joseph Sharfin. The Republican opposition will not give this informative list to the country. All they publicize, as I have stated, is that this great musician rendered on a program some 5 or 6 years ago, among English, Italian, Bohemian, German, and other numbers, a Russian composition. This is another instance where the Republican leaders again charge one connected with the administration as being tinted, a "red", or a Communist.

Mr. Speaker, I recall that several weeks ago several Members demanded that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] name any Communist in the administration, but he was unable to do so.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], unfortunately, has misled my colleagues from Texas [Mr. DIES] and Georgia [Mr. COX]. Only a few days ago in my city, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] again made the unfounded statement about alleged Communists in the Government employ; and, notwithstanding, as I have stated, that he cannot name one person connected with the administration who is a Communist, he went further and stated, according to the press reports, that there are 10,000,000 Communists in the United States. During the 2 years of investigation by his committee he has been unable to give more than a baker's dozen that can truthfully be designated as such. Of this number, not a single one stated he was in favor of the overthrow by force of our form of government. Despite that, the Republican newspapers carry great headlines day in and day out warning of an alleged impending danger to our country from the Communists. Even the little darling of the movies, Shirley Temple, has not been spared but has been included in a list of so-called "pinks" or Communists.

Thus Mr. DIES' alleged statement was made of the whole cloth and wholly fictional; and such demagogic statements, used eagerly by a press unfriendly to the administration, are regrettable and must be deplored by the informed and intelligent American citizenry.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] and a few other gentlemen object to the expenditures; but if they would recollect the conditions in 1931, 1932, and 1933, when thousands upon thousands of our young men were crowding the highways and byways of the country, without employment or lodging and with hungry stomachs, I am sure that they would feel that they are not justified in opposing this appropriation that proposes at this time to give hundreds of thousands of our young men and women an opportunity to acquire an education and enable them to become self-sustaining. I am satisfied that when the vote is taken on the resolution, with the exception of a few, who, as I have stated, have spoken for political reasons, there will not be many who will conscientiously dare vote against the resolution making this appropriation in order.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the RECORD should show, in all fairness, that Mr. Williams started as a poor boy and has gone along the route of the average American. During the World War he first served in the French Foreign Legion. When America entered the war, he enlisted in the American forces. He was wounded. He was commissioned a lieutenant. I think the RECORD should show these facts.

Mr. SABATH. It will; it will show them all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a biographical sketch of Mr. Williams.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present. I want to put those fellows on record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that a quorum is not present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and eleven Members are present, not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 360, nays 10, answered "present" 2, not voting, 58, as follows:

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, when an appropriation bill was being considered by the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] and I had quite a colloquy on the National Labor Relations Board. I find on inspection of the RECORD this morning that nothing appears of that debate. I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman in yielding to me, and I would like to have the statements made on the floor appear in the RECORD. I find the matter has been withheld. As a matter of personal privilege I would like to have the RECORD made complete.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may say to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] that when a Member who has the floor in his own right engages in colloquy with another Member, under the rules he has the right to withhold the remarks from the RECORD temporarily. The Chair may add that he has 30 days, under the rules of the House, in which to revise his remarks and place them in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I assume they will appear in the Appendix, then, and not in the body of the RECORD. I may say for the information of the House and of the Speaker that the gentleman from Michigan yielded to me. It was my expectation that the position I took in support of organized labor and the principles of labor would appear in the RECORD this morning.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered at Buffalo, N. Y., by Mr. John C. Beukema, of Muskegon, Mich., chairman of the executive committee of the National Seaway Council on the St. Lawrence seaway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

LABOR-SECURITY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9007) making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H. R. 9007, with Mr. BUCK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. At the close of the debate on Monday, March 25, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] had consumed 4 hours and 26 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] had consumed 3 hours and 44 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. May I say to the Chair that on yesterday unanimous consent was obtained for 2 hours of additional debate, one-half of which was to be accorded to this side of the aisle and one-half to the minority side.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss some of the reasons why I believe the National Youth Administration, under its present management, is a menace to the youth of America. I propose thereafter to go into an analysis of the purposes and the way in which this money has been expended.

In the first place, I wish to repeat a few of the things that have been said here on the floor. This organization was established, I believe, for the purpose of providing a job for Mr. Aubrey Williams and letting him give full vent to his ideas about how the youth problem of America ought to be handled. To my mind, the gentleman has yielded to influences that ought not to be served by the Government of the United States or any agency thereof. To my mind, the type of administration, the way the organization has been handled, has been a menace to many of the youths of this country. To my mind, there are activities pending at the present moment that call for the closest scrutiny and the most careful consideration by this Congress.

In the first place, there are four or five indications that Mr. Williams has been catering to the Communist element. For my own part, I am not saying that he is a Communist, but I am saying that a man who caters so much to that group is not a safe man to trust to spend $85,000,000 of the Government's money.

The Workers Alliance is a well-known communistic organization. The principal officer, David Lasser, has been to Moscow at the expense of the Workers Alliance. Herbert Benjamin, the secretary-treasurer, is an avowed Communist and a member of the general committee of the Communist Party. Mr. Williams appeared before this group in 1938, a year ago last summer, and, among other things, said:

> Now, there are a lot of things I would like to say to you. When it is all said and done, I would look back upon the hours spent in conference with David Lasser, Herbert Benjamin, Morris Watson, and other representatives of the unemployed and W. P. A. workers as the high spot of my life in Washington.

It appears that Mr. Williams has provided the American Youth Congress for a long time with 22 clerks. You all know what the American Youth Congress is. Representatives of this Youth Congress have been recent visitors to Washington. You all know whether or not that is a communistic organization. I do not know what you think about it but my own opinion is that that was not an expenditure for a public purpose. It was not a lawful purpose under the law. I do not believe a man who cuts that kind of a caper is the kind of a man who ought to be trusted with the administration of $85,000,000 of the people's money.

Along about the 26th of January there began a series of press releases from the office of Mr. Williams about collecting 109 players into an orchestra headed by Leopold Stokowski, of Philadelphia, the orchestra to make a tour of South America. Let me read you the proposed itinerary of that orchestra. They have an inaugural concert on July 4 in Washington. They leave from New York on the steamship Washington, one of the largest of American liners, belonging to the United States Line. They go on a concert tour to Habana, Curacao, Caracas, Rio de Janiero, Sao Paulo, Montevideo, Buenos Aires, Rosario; again to Montevideo, then to Sao Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, St. Thomas, then San Juan, and back to New York on the 27th of August.

It appears from the testimony of Mr. Williams that the N. Y. A. has paid only $3,500 toward this operation. Personally, I cannot believe that any man, as a business proposition, is entering upon this venture of chartering a ship for a 2 months' trip of those proportions, taking with him 109 members of the orchestra, and paying them union wages and a $5 per diem. I cannot conceive that any individuals have contributed $1,000,000 toward the cost of such an operation. We are told that the W. P. A. is not doing it. I am wondering what organization of the Government is putting up the $1,000,000 it will cost for this tour.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to say or intend to say that the youth of America, drawn from the ranks of the N. Y. A. and put in charge of this Mr. Stokowski, who was naturalized in 1935, are to be used in propagandizing South America in behalf of communism at the expense of the Federal Government?

Mr. TABER. No; I do not know who is paying for the tour. I wonder. I cannot imagine any private organization or anything of that kind paying for it. The only way I can conceive of its being paid for is out of Federal funds, or by some foreign government. That is the only way I can figure it out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman any evidence whatever that any organization of the Federal Government is putting up the money for this tour, and does not the gentleman know that this is not a Government expedition, but a private tour of ambitious young musicians?

Mr. TABER. I do not know that it is a private proposition. I could not find out who was putting up the money.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman conceive of it being possible that the gentleman from Oklahoma would be satisfied to turn over the youth of this country, drawn from the ranks of the National Youth Administration, and put them in charge of this Mr. Stokowski, a Communist, naturalized in 1935?

Mr. TABER. I cannot.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLINS. Does the gentleman insinuate that some agency of our Government is paying for this tour of South America?

Mr. TABER. I do not mean to insinuate anything. I am asking questions and I am saying that I cannot conceive of anybody undertaking this venture as an item of business for private profit. I cannot conceive of any group of individuals putting up what I believe would be at least $1,000,000 to cover the cost of the thing. I am wondering where the money comes from. The only place I can think of where it might come from is our Government or some other government. I am anxious to find out where this money is coming from and I think this Congress ought to know where the money is coming from. I insinuate nothing; I wonder; and I will yield to anyone who knows where the money is coming from to answer.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman is prepared to answer that question; yes.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I suggest that the gentleman communicate with Walt Disney, of Hollywood, and he will find out who is putting up the money.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman thinks it is a joke that the youth of America are to be placed under that kind of influence, I am disappointed in the gentleman.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. That is the truth.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GEYER of California. I would just like to know whether or not the gentleman is going to let our good colleague from Georgia get away with the insinuation that this is a communistic propaganda jaunt.

Mr. TABER. We know the name of the man who is at the head of the orchestra. We know his record. It is in the Red Network. It has been read here on the floor. It appears at page 5 of the supplemental hearings of the committee, held on March 14.

Mr. GEYER of California. Is the gentleman taking the Red Network as an authority?

Mr. TABER. Oh, I take anything that is absolutely truthful as an authority.

Mr. GEYER of California. I am afraid the gentleman does take anything as the truth.

Mr. TABER. I do not see why the gentleman should question absolute authority.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield for a question.

Mr. COLLINS. Does the gentleman insist or insinuate that some agency of this Government or some foreign government is paying for this tour to South America?

Mr. TABER. I insist that I insinuate nothing. I say that I can conceive of no other answer to the question than that the money must come from some Government funds or from some foreign government.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I have told the gentleman that it is Walt Disney.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I want to say that the gentleman is absolutely correct with regard to Stokowski and alien subversive activities. What does his orchestra play? Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, Verdi—absolutely alien and subversive; I agree with the gentleman. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman has posed a very interesting and, I assume, a pertinent question as to whether or not any of the funds are to be provided by the Federal Government. We have under consideration an appropriation of $85,000,000, and in the testimony on page 6——

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman is meaning to absolve this appropriation, if the gentleman had been listening to what I have said, he would know that I said that Mr. Williams claimed that only $3,500 was coming out of this particular appropriation; but there must be some source for this money, and that is what I think this Congress ought to have when we have such a question as this raised. There is no answer in the hearings at all to that question.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HARE. Does the gentleman mean to say now that he does not charge that any of the money will come out of this appropriation?

Mr. TABER. I am making no charges at all as to what it is coming out of. I am asking what it is coming out of, and that is what I have been doing right along. The gentleman, who is an apologist evidently for the N. Y. A., cannot distinguish between a charge and a question. I am asking a question, and I get no answer.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman let me read the testimony that is an answer?

Mr. TABER. If it is an answer.

Mr. HARE. The question is asked by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] on page 6:

> Is there any item of cost whatever other than the incidental cost in the selection of those who are to compose the orchestra to be borne by Federal funds?

The answer is:

> Not one penny.
> Mr. TARVER. As to the chartering of a ship which has been referred to, will you pay any part of that?
>
> Mr. WILLIAMS. Not one penny. That is a private matter which Mr. Stokowski has handled, and I have nothing to do with that at all.
>
> Mr. TARVER. As to the wages to be paid to the members of the orchestra, do you pay any of those?
> Mr. WILLIAMS. Not one penny.

Mr. TABER. That does not satisfy me. I have said that I do not believe that that is an answer to where the money is coming from.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Oh, I think the gentlemen ought to hear a little more of this before we get through. I have a lot of ground to cover, and I have only 20 minutes granted to me. I think that is pretty well gone. I think I have been very liberal in yielding, and I do not think the gentleman is able to answer the question. Then there arises the question as to what they do with the money in this N. Y. A. operation. In 1939, when Mr. Williams came before the Committee on Appropriations for funds, it appeared on page 173 of the hearings that out of a proposed expenditure of $123,000,000, $84,000,000, or two-thirds, was to be spent on work projects in competition with the W. P. A., and that $27,000,000 was to be spent on student-aid programs, and that the rest was to go for some kind of youth services and administration. At that time Mr. Williams told us that he had 6,000 employees. One hundred million dollars was appropriated. At this time he has practically 10,500 employees, and in a supervisory capacity he has practically 2,000, in an administrative capacity.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I do not yield.

Mr. HILL. I believe that I can answer the question the gentleman has asked.

Mr. TABER. I do not yield at this time. If the gentleman is able to answer the question, however, if he will guarantee that he is able to answer it, I yield now.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman said he believes the newspapers a while ago.

Mr. TABER. I do not know. I do sometimes.

Mr. HILL. The newspapers three times have said that Walt Disney, that creator of those communistic things like Pinocchio and Seven Dwarfs and Mickey Mouse, is going to pay for it. That is, the newspapers have said that. If the gentleman believes in newspapers, that ought to be an answer to his question.

Mr. TABER. I do not believe that Walt Disney is paying all that money for that operation. I cannot conceive it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. TABER. The proposal with reference to expenditures for the next fiscal year of this $85,000,000 involves something like a break-up of $27,000,000 for this school aid and $50,000,000 for projects. I do not know how you are finding these projects. In my territory I find that they are using those projects for all sorts of queer things; that the set-up is very poor; that the choice of people who go on these projects is not made effectively, nor do I believe it can be made effectively, with any such number as is involved. I had the representative of the N. Y. A. in my own territory come to see me and he told me about the situation. I cross-questioned him for 2 hours. He had something like 25 or 30 people supposed to be on his pay roll. I tried to find out what they did and where they were. I was not able to get the story. I am informed that that is a typical situation. I know of cases in my own territory where many from one family have been on the rolls, and Mr. Williams told us a year ago that that did not make any difference. There is no selection of those people on the basis of need. What are we going to do? Are we going on with this kind of program forever? Are we going on with this kind of set-up? Are we going to feel that those boys and girls in high schools have to be paid for being there? Frankly I do not believe it is necessary. I do not believe it is doing real constructive work for the boys and girls in America.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I have not the time to yield. I am sorry. I do not believe there is anything that we could do for the boys and girls of America that would be better for them than to try to make them more self-reliant. Let them exert themselves as we used to have to do when we were boys and girls, and try to take care of themselves. I do not believe that we are doing something for the boys and girls of America when we go on with this program, headed by this gentleman. I feel that it is a menace to the youth of America; I feel that when we are voting for it we are voting something that is a menace to the boys and girls of today, the men and women of tomorrow. Some time we are going to come to a point in this country where we have a sense of responsibility toward the people, and we are not going on with this sort of thing. There is absolutely no reason in the world why we should not at this time set our faces forward and stop these reactionary programs which demoralize our youth.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I decline to yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I thought the gentleman wanted to know who was putting up the money.

Mr. TABER. Oh, you have had three chances already. You do not need any more. It is about time that we here in Congress showed some sense of responsibility and stopped turning over millions and millions and millions of dollars to people to go ahead with programs of this type. The construction programs that they embark on cannot, in my opinion, be of value to the communities or to the boys and girls. I hope that when our committee comes to read this bill for amendment it will take care of some of these situations. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twelve Members are present, a quorum.

The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the Appropriations Committee has deleted from this bill the appropriation for the Economic Division of the National Labor Relations Board. I compliment the committee upon its action in that respect. I foresee that there will be an effort made to put that item back in the bill. I suspect that the committee acted more wisely than it knew, and I have some information on the subject of that Economic Division that I want to submit to the House, because if this item is put back in the bill it is more than likely there will be a roll call vote on it, and it is only fair that we should have all the facts that we can in order to intelligently vote on the subject.

That Division is headed by Mr. David J. Saposs, and it is largely concerning him and his activities that I wish to make a few remarks.

David J. Saposs, Chief of the Economic Division of the National Labor Relations Board for several years, was born in Russia. He came to the United States at the age of nine. He went to many colleges and finally wound up as head of what was known as Brookwood College, which during the time of his incumbency in that office was denounced by the American Federation of Labor as a communistic school. He later came to the National Labor Relations Board, and he is there now.

Attention had been drawn to his activities more than a year ago by the Dies committee. Some of the material that I am going to refer to was supplied by the Dies committee and is a matter of public record and has been for a year, and yet Saposs is still head of the Economic Division of the National Labor Relations Board.

I am not going to undertake to brand Mr. Saposs as a Communist or a Fascist or a Nazi. They all smell about alike to me, but what I do propose to do is to refer you to certain official exhibits before committees of this House containing Saposs' own expressions. I will read you extracts from them, and you may be the jury and you may form your own verdict as to what he is and what are his philosophies of government.

In the first place, I refer you to a publication known as Labor Age, which is the official publication of a society known as Conference for Progressive Labor Action. You will find that Mr. Saposs was a member of that organization and that he was in fact a member of the executive committee of that organization and a member of the editorial staff of their publication, Labor Age.

Contained in the November 1931 issue of that magazine is a statement of the purposes of that organization of which he was a member of the executive committee. I read from this statement:

> Working with such a mass labor party once it is formed, in order that it may not fall into opportunism, but may advance as swiftly and as steadily as possible to its true goal, the complete abolition of planless, profiteering capitalism, and the building of a workers' republic. The C. P. L. A. aims to function as such a militant left wing political organization.

Mr. Saposs on the witness stand before the special committee stated that he did not subscribe to that doctrine and had promptly resigned from the organization as soon as it was published. The fact is that in the following publication of that magazine you will find an article by Saposs entitled "Left Opposition." I want to read an extract from it:

> Its spokesmen—

Referring to the minority of a radical convention he was attending—> maintained that economic conditions are ripe for socialism and that the International should therefore direct its forces for the immediate overthrow of capitalism. Instead of taking this positive position, the majority favors temporizing. This is a fallacious attitude. The Socialist movement must tell the people that capitalism cannot be stabilized and that the world cannot be saved by capitalist devices.

Another section:

> But bourgeois democracy is a sham. When it is evident that socialism is the only remedy it is not worth saving a democracy in which socialist parties only collaborate with capitalism.

I wish I could read some more of it, but I do not have the time. However, all of it is part of the official record of our committee and printed in the hearings. That was read into the record in the hearings before our committee. Mr. Saposs said that was not his language, that he was just reporting a convention, and he disclaimed responsibility for what he said. He further stated that he resigned from the C. P. L. A. promptly when it printed its statement of policies. Two years later, however, the masthead of that same paper, Labor Action, carries this:

> Serving the interests of workers and dirt farmers. Published by the Conference for Progressive Labor Action.
> Editorial board: David J. Saposs, among others.

That was 2 years after he said he had withdrawn from that organization and repudiated it.

On the letterhead of the organization—and this was brought out before the Dies committee a year ago—on the letterhead of the Conference of Progressive Labor Action appears, under the heading "National Executive Committee," the name of David J. Saposs. Printed on this letterhead amongst its objectives is this sentence:

> Its aims to inspire the workers to take control of industry and Government, abolish the present capitalist system and build a workers' republic and an economic system operated for the benefit of the masses and not for the few.

Mr. Saposs undertook to repudiate some of those statements. So we turn to his own writings that he cannot repudiate. Here is a volume that comes from the Congressional Library entitled "Economic Essays in Honor of Wesley Clair Mitchell," and in it is found an essay by David J. Saposs, from which I shall read a part. This he cannot repudiate. I ask you to listen to the language of his own article:

It is a case of the lamb lying down with the lion. In order to save the situation, the middle class must join the workers and both must go in for a daring and far-reaching socialization program that will hit at the heart of capitalism. Merely reviving the traditional demand for decentralizing capitalism or checking its growth is trying to repeat a futile historic struggle in which populism has invariably been worsted.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give us the date of the copyright, please.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Nineteen hundred and thirty-five is the year, I think.

Mr. KELLER. It will be found printed right in the book.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Nineteen hundred and thirty-five is correct.

I am sorry I cannot read many excerpts from this. Some are very interesting. I will read from the concluding paragraph:

Nor can the objective of replacing capitalism be attained without a fusion of the middle class and the workers. By endorsing a collectivist culture and program they have a common ground upon which to unite in waging battle against capitalism. If these social and economic forces can be brought together, they can build an effective and constructive movement that will save the country and the world from catastrophe. Unless such a movement is brought into being capitalism will go marching on with its poverty, misery, and economic insecurity. The time is ripe; have the middle class and workers the will to rise to the occasion?

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I say, I do not undertake to label this gentleman. I read to you his own writings and you can pin your own label to the man. I desire to present now for your consideration the question: Is this the kind of person whom you want in a policy-making position in the Government of the United States constitutionally and traditionally dedicated to the system of private property ownership? [Applause.] I have told you something about what he is and what his philosophy is. I shall now submit what he actually does on the National Labor Relations Board. It is very interesting. I wish I had a little more time, but I am going to have to cut it short. I will take just one case to exemplify his duties; I will discuss the Inland Steel case.

In the Inland Steel case there was a dispute between the employer and the employees but there was no case before the Labor Board. It had no jurisdiction and no complaint had been made to it. By direction of the Labor Board, Mr. Nathan Witt, assistant counsel, was sent out to Pittsburgh to hold a conference with the C. I. O. and determine how it was best for the Labor Board to get into that case. He wrote a memorandum back to the home office which is in the printed record of our committee, in which he said that he had advised the C. I. O. to make a demand on Inland Steel for a written contract, knowing that that demand would be refused and thereby in their opinion induce the Inland Steel Co. to commit an inadvertent violation of the law, because the Board took the position that the law required a written contract. The C. I. O. made that demand. The Inland Steel Co., as expected, refused to comply, and immediately proceedings were instituted; in fact, as soon as they were told to make this demand on Inland Steel their lawyer in Chicago was directed to prepare all the pleadings so that as soon as this trap was sprung on Inland Steel they would be able to proceed. All right. Now, there was nothing in the law requiring a written contract, and there was not any evidence about a written contract. Judge Earl Major, with whom many of us served in the House, recently in the decision in the Inland Steel case said that this Board was "the prosecutor, the judge, the jury, and the executioner."

The court overlooked just one item. This Board supplies its own professional witnesses on an annual basis at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States. David J. Saposs and his staff of economists are those witnesses. So Mr. Witt writes back to Washington—and his memorandum is in the files—to hurry up and get ready to present this case and get Saposs to be ready with his material to testify to the necessity of a written contract. There is nothing in the law about a written contract, but they wanted to test that question. Not having any law for it, they had to have some evidence, but under the law as it was construed by the Board at that time all they had to have was some evidence. They did not have to have substantial evidence, as the courts say now they must have. The evidence was to be David J. Saposs. I wish you would read it. They put that man on the witness stand, and for 300 pages he testified as an expert witness on the legal question whether under this act it was necessary to put a collective-bargaining contract in writing. Strange as it may seem, that is exactly and identically what happened in that case and what has happened right along.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am sorry; I cannot. If I had more time, I would yield. There are one or two things I want to mention.

That was known to this Board 2 years ago. Here is a memorandum, which is a part of the official records of the Board, dated July 16, 1938, from the assistant chief trial examiner to his chief protesting the case of this alleged expert testimony on the ground that it was utterly worthless.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to remind the Members of this House that the Labor Committee, not the Appropriations Committee, is charged with the duty of recommending legislation on bills affecting labor.

Almost as old as this body itself is the rule that the Appropriations Committee is without power to legislate. As early as 1837 the House made this tradition an express part of its rules. Every time that the Appropriations Committee has tried to exceed its jurisdiction by expropriating a part of the jurisdiction of another committee the House has firmly reminded that committee of its proper functions.

I do not suppose there is a member of the Appropriations Committee that would seriously deny this. Yet last Thursday the committee slashed one-fifth of the appropriation of the Wage and Hour Division, giving as its reason not that the money was unnecessary for the proper enforcement of the law but that the committee felt that certain amendatory legislation or administrative action was necessary. On page 13 of Report 1822 the committee writes:

The committee recognize the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act. They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only serve in lending further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.

This report raises a fundamental question which vitally concerns every Member of this body. We have attempted, by delegating to different committees of the House jurisdiction over various matters, to create an orderly system for the consideration of legislation. I do not believe that it is the intention of this body to vest in the Appropriations Committee the power to bring about the passage or repeal of legislation which affects the welfare of the Nation's workers, or of its farmers, or of its Army, or of its Navy. This House has appointed legislative committees for those specific purposes—the Committees on Labor, Agriculture, Military Affairs, and Naval Affairs.

The issue is clear-cut. Who has the power to legislate on questions relating to labor? In 1883 the Labor Committee was established for the express purpose of considering legislation "relating to and affecting labor." That function, as far as I know, has never been turned over to the Appropriations Committee.

This is not the first time in our history that the Appropriations Committee has tried to force legislation or to force administrative action by providing that funds would not be made available unless the Congress or the executive department would do what the Appropriations Committee wanted. Sometimes the committee has tried to force congressional or Executive action by making an appropriation conditional upon that action. But every time they have tried this the proposed legislation has been ruled out of order. The Appropriations Committee apparently remembered this last Thursday, so they tried to do by indirection what they could not do directly. They simply withheld the money—although they knew and although they admitted that the Wage and Hour Division needed that money to enforce the act as now written and interpreted, promising that if Congress and the Wage and Hour Division acted according to the dictates of the Appropriations Committee, funds would be forthcoming later. This is a concrete admission that the funds are needed now. If the House yields to this indirect attempt to legislate, every standing committee will be in danger of losing its historic jurisdiction.

The Appropriations Committee, to use its own language—

Recognize the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act.

In other words, the Appropriations Committee has recognized that the money it is withholding from the Division is money immediately necessary for an even-handed and adequate enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The workers for whom this act was passed are entitled to more than the printed words of the statute. They are entitled to enforcement of the rights Congress has conferred on them. Employers who have recognized their responsibilities under the act are entitled to be protected from illegal competition which may result in their bankruptcy. They should not be penalized for complying with a law that Congress has placed on the books.

In June 1938 the House passed the Fair Labor Standards Act by an overwhelming majority of 291 to 89. If the House desires to alter this legislation I am confident it would prefer to do so in the only honest way—by a vote of its membership and pursuant to an orderly recommendation of its Labor Committee. Failure to appropriate sufficient funds to properly enforce a law passed by Congress after full consideration is not an honest way to treat the hundreds of thousands of employers complying with the law and the millions of workers looking to it for protection against sweatshop wages and hours.

When we come to the proper place in the bill before the Committee, amendments will be offered to restore to the bill the amount recommended by the President, which I hope the Committee will support. The cut in the 1941 Budget would have the effect:

First. It would prevent the expansion of the Division in accordance with the 1940 Budget. The expenditure of 1940 funds was planned on a monthly increment basis. If the Division expanded according to plan, the total personnel on the pay roll on June 30 could not be carried during the 1941 fiscal year on the reduced amount proposed by the committee.

Second. It would require the discharge of employees now working for the Division. The recruitment of inspectors has been retarded by the necessity of setting up civil-service lists. Other branches of the Division have been able to expand to their June 1940 personnel already. It will, therefore, be necessary to discharge employees in these branches of the Division in order to have an inspection staff proportionate to the rest of the Division.

Third. The Appropriations Committee slash equals, roughly, 460 inspection personnel and 30 legal personnel.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Labor complains of a certain provision of this bill because it was not handled by the Labor Committee. I would simply like to inquire when that committee expects to end the sit-down strike it has inaugurated over the proposal to amend the wage-hour law? [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY].

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] has just complained about the sit-down strike, as he terms it, of the Labor Committee. I can see no justification for so describing any action of the Labor Committee or of failure to act on legislation properly referred to it. It is a standing committee of this House composed of our colleagues, men and women of ability, honor, and integrity. The gentleman, however, must have a very vivid recollection of the time when his committee on this very same issue defied the will and mandate of the House for more than a year. [Applause.] On that memorable occasion he and his colleagues on the Rules Committee refused to report a rule for the consideration of the wage and hour legislation, although the people of this country, from one end to the other, were demanding the passage of that act. The people of this country today still strongly support the philosophy of that legislation. The attempt that is being made now by a clique or cabal of men in this House is nothing more than an effort to cripple and strangulate this act and thus prevent its efficient enforcement.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT].

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I want to give you a brief picture of the National Youth program in my State of Oklahoma—to tell you what it means to 22,200 boys and girls in my State alone. That is the number it now employs; 13,000 of them are high-school and college boys and girls who would be unable to continue their education. These boys and girls, I am told, make better grades than youth attending high school and college who are not working. A great number of them are from farm and country families; they could not attend high school and college without the aid of N. Y. A. Some of the boys are studying agriculture and other subjects about which good progressive farmers should know. Many of the girls are studying homemaking, home canning, and other things which a farm woman should know.

The N. Y. A. in my State is building youth work centers, vocational centers, and other buildings. The boys are learning trades; they are receiving training in lines which they never could have had any knowledge of had it not been for N. Y. A. For instance, they are learing about such things as masonry, carpentry, electrical work, plumbing, plastering, and painting. The boys build these buildings with only professional supervision. All labor is done by the youth themselves. The United States is overcrowded by young men who have studied law, medicine, accounting, and such. We need men who can build things with their hands—men who know trades. Reports show that 80 percent of W. P. A. workers are unskilled. With millions unemployed, there is a shortage of skilled workers.

The girls in the out-of-school program are taught homemaking, cooking, canning, sewing, housekeeping, child care. They are learning to do by doing.

Boys and girls are undergoing physical examination which is required under the N. Y. A. health program. Some of them had never had a physical examination before. It has resulted in much remedial work in addition to a check on the spread of social diseases.

The fact that every poor student who is unable to go to college is removed from competition with adults who need to work seems to me to be one of the best means of helping to solve the unemployment situation throughout the country. Education is certainly one of the means by which we can keep many young people off the relief rolls and help them to prepare to earn their own ways in the world.

Without this program, these 22,000 young people in my State alone would be restless, unoccupied, underfed, poorly clothed, idle—most of all idle. We all know what happens to youth under those circumstances. Think back a few years, say, from 1930 to 1933 or so, before there was a National Youth program. Youth on the bum—on highways, in boxcars, in hobo jungles, on street corners, in dives, in jail. The morale of the men and women who are to be the future leaders of our Nation was being destroyed. Who knows but that is what makes the Hitlers and Stalins?

For these reasons, I think it is a very short-sighted policy to reduce N. Y. A. appropriations and prevent thousands of boys and girls from learning to do for themselves—from learning to do things by which they may earn their living and make good citizens, and prevent thousands of earnest and eager students from enrolling in our universities, colleges, and technical schools.

For these reasons, I am in favor of voting every penny of the $85,000,000 Budget estimate; and, not only that, but I should like to see a larger sum appropriated for this most worthy program—the National Youth Administration. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, in the very limited time allotted I prefer to direct my remarks to matters considered by the committee relating to the appropriation for the National Youth Administration. Many statements have been made calculated to criticize the committee for the reduction in this appropriation, whereas others are calculated to criticize the committee for not making the reductions larger.

I should like to review within a few minutes some of the work of this agency of the Government. The National Youth Administration, as we all know, had its origin in 1935 and was created by an Executive order in the Work Projects Administration, the direct purpose being to enlarge the opportunity for work relief among young people between the ages of 16 and 25.

I believe it should be made clear that this was a relief activity in its origin, and I quote from the first Executive order issued by the President of the United States, which is as follows:

> To initiate and administer a program of approved projects which shall provide relief, work relief, and employment for persons between the ages of 16 and 25, requiring full time and who are not regularly engaged in remunerative employment.

Under Executive Order No. 7164, student-aid projects are defined as follows:

> The student-aid projects are hereby defined to be projects financed in whole or in part from funds appropriated by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, which provides financial assistance to the needy young people in amounts which will permit them to continue their education in high schools, colleges, or graduate schools in exchange for part-time work upon useful projects.

The work is divided into three classes: (A) Aid to needy students who desire to pursue postgraduate work, (B) to students who desire to complete their college courses, and (C) to needy young men and women who desire to complete their training in high schools.

The project known as out-of-school work is for the benefit of boys and girls, young men and young women, who have finished high school and are without employment.

In April of 1936 the number of youth employed in high school is reported at 281,498, the number in college at 128,055, and those in graduate work 4,395. In April 1937 the number in high school receiving aid is reported at 297,871, those in college 140,699, and in graduate work 5,416. In April 1939 the number in high school receiving aid is reported at 272,792, in college 110,068, and in grade school 2,899.

In April of 1936 the number of youth employed in the out-of-school work program is reported at 181,279. In April 1937 the number was 189,866. In April 1939 the number was 228,268. On December of last year the National Youth Administration reports 314,310 young people receiving aid in the high-school program, 120,000 in colleges and universities, and 312,000 in out-of-school projects, making a total of 746,310. The average monthly wage is reported at $9.69, the average being $4.41 per month for those getting work inside of high school, $12.59 for those getting work in colleges, and $15 per month for youth working on out-of-school work projects.

The rate of pay ranges for 18 cents up to 41 cents per hour, depending largely on prevailing wages in the locality for the type of labor rendered.

The average age of the youth working in the N. Y. A. is 19 years 9 months, 29 percent of the total having completed high school, although an additional 30 percent attended high school for 1 year or more, it being stated in the testimony that 4 out of 10 did not go beyond the eighth grade in school work.

Of the 322,000 employed in the out-of-school work program in January of this year it is reported that 96.8 percent were certified as in need of assistance. In the current fiscal year $67,133,000 funds have been allocated for the N. Y. A. out-of-school program and the funds distributed to the States have been made on the basis of youth population between the ages of 18 and 24 years inclusive. They are employed on workshop and sewing machine projects, repair of furniture, making different kinds of clothing, household articles, preserving foods, and so forth.

Funds allocated to the college program are allotted on the basis of enrollment as of October 1 of each year. At present there are 28,301 high schools where young people are working on N. Y. A. projects and in 1,698 colleges. During the present year $28,100,000 were allocated for high school and college projects, and out of this amount $13,675,000 were allocated for student aid in high schools and $14,374,000 for colleges and graduate school work. Approximately 73 percent of the school and college students come from families with incomes less than $1,000 per annum, it being the policy of the Administration to base such aid on unemployment or need rather than educational purposes alone. In the out-of-school work program considerable attention is given to teaching young people to prepare themselves for various types of work. About 90 percent of the administrative cost is charged to the out-of-school work program and about 10 percent to the college or school program.

It has been thought and said by some that the out-of-school program of the N. Y. A. has to some extent been competing with private industry, particularly with manufacturing establishments making desks and other school equipment. The evidence, however, before the committee seems to show that the activities of the N. Y. A. are not competitive with private industry for the reason that none of the supplies or equipment made are sold or offered for sale, or placed with any school that would be in the market for such equipment.

The appropriation recommended by the Bureau of the Budget for the coming fiscal year is $85,000,000 as compared with the $100,454,000 for the fiscal year of 1940. The Administrator estimates that $56,191,000 will be used for out-of-school work program, $11,451,000 in the high school work program, and $11,993,000 in college and graduate work, leaving $4,415,000 for administrative expenses. Of the $115,000 estimated for communication service $77,940 are allocated for telephone service, $33,160 for telegraph service, and $4,000 for air-mail and special-delivery postage.

It should be observed that in addition to the National Youth Administration two other governmental agencies, the Civilian Conservation Corps and the Work Projects Administration, are furnishing employment to youth between the ages of 18 and 25 years, it being reported that approximately 278,000 such young people are furnished work through the W. P. A., about 250,000 in the Civilian Conservation Corps, and 312,000 in the N. Y. A., making a total of 840,000, excluding those receiving aid in high schools and colleges. Of course, there is some difference in the character of the services rendered and the pay received. In the W. P. A. it is solely work relief and the individual receives his or her pay or compensation direct. Young men and young women are both given work relief under the W. P. A. program. In the Civilian Conservation Corps young men only are admitted and by virtue of an allotment arrangement $25 per month of their compensation is forwarded to the dependent parent or parents. Both men and women are eligible for employment in the N. Y. A. and, in addition to work, many are given educational training in high schools and colleges. Those employed on out-of-school work programs are generally furnished work that will equip them for private employment when opportunity affords. Buildings, recreational, or other projects undertaken by the N. Y. A. are usually of the inexpensive type or smaller project, the average cost or outlay amounting to twelve or fifteen hundred dollars.

I wish to suggest a possible answer to some criticisms to the effect that the reduction in the proposed appropriation as compared with the appropriation for the present fiscal year is not justified. I cannot speak authoritatively as to what prompted the President and the Budget Bureau to reduce this appropriation, but on pages 568 and 569, part 2, of the committee hearings we find that during the first 6 months of the fiscal year of 1939, when the N. Y. A. appropriation was $75,100,000, the N. Y. A. paid in earnings to high-school students, college students, graduate students, and out-of-school students approximately $31,200,000, and during the corresponding period for the fiscal year 1940, when the appropriation was $100,000,000, these payments approximated $34,300,000, or an increase of about 10 percent over the previous year.

We note further that during the first 6 months of the fiscal year for 1939 there were on an average of 409,733 young people employed per month in high schools, colleges, and out-of-school work, whereas for the corresponding 6 months in the fiscal year of 1940 the average number employed per month was 455,329, or an increase of about 11 percent.

I call attention to these figures not for the purpose of submitting any criticism to the activities or work of the National Youth Administration, but for the purpose of showing the ground upon which the President of the United States and the Budget makers may have acted in recommending a reduction of $15,000,000 per annum in this appropriation.

As we have already said, in the fiscal year 1939 there was an appropriation of $75,100,000, which was increased to $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1940. I imagine the Budget makers in preparing their Budget for the fiscal year 1941 undertook to make an inventory of the work of the National Youth Administration to see to what extent the increased funds were being used to increase opportunities for employment among the youth of the Nation. It will be observed that the appropriation for the fiscal year 1940 was increased 33⅓ percent over the appropriation for the fiscal year 1939, but when the Budget makers saw from the record that during the first 6 months of the fiscal year 1940 the number of young men and young women who had been given employment had increased only 11 percent with an increased appropriation of 33⅓ percent, and when the same Budget makers saw that the amount of money expended in the employment of youth had increased only 10 percent during the first 6 months of the fiscal year 1940 as compared with the first 6 months of the fiscal year 1939 they concluded that the peak of employment through this activity had been reached and that approximately $85,000,000 was taking care of this load in the fiscal year 1940 and would, therefore, be sufficient for the year 1941. Of course, there is testimony before the committee that refutes this conclusion.

But, to repeat my thought, the figures referred to show that out of the increased appropriation of $25,000,000 for the fiscal year 1940 only a little over $3,000,000 was spent during the first 6 months of the fiscal year 1940 in paying students for work in high schools, colleges, and out-of-school work employment. Now, if I wanted to be critical, it could be argued that the N. Y. A. should have spent at least eight to ten million dollars more during the first 6 months of the fiscal year 1940 in paying salaries or wages to young men and young women, as provided for under the original Executive order, and if the funds were going to be used for some other purpose, then the natural and logical thing to do would be to reduce the appropriation.

As I said at the outset, I do not know whether or not the Budget Bureau or the President had this in mind, but in view of the facts submitted to the committee in the hearings it is logical to see that the present number of employed both in college and high school and in out-of-school work can be maintained and continued with an appropriation of $85,000,000 per year, and I assume it was for this reason the estimate was placed at $85,000,000. There may have been other reasons, I do not know, but it is significant to observe that out of the $25,000,000 increase last year in the appropriation for the present fiscal year only a little more than $3,000,000 was used during the first 6 months of this year than was used during the first 6 months of last year to pay the salaries or wages of youths employed. If we are to assume that during the next 6 months of this fiscal year the amount used by the N. Y. A. will continue on the same basis as for the first 6 months, then only a little more than $6,000,000 of the $25,000,000 increase provided last year will be utilized this year for paying for the employment of youth.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY].

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am particularly impressed with the report of the committee appointed by the conference on the problems of youth. That committee and the men attending that conference are not radicals. The men who attended the conference who are known to me include Henry I. Harriman, of Boston, Mass., past president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and Henry T. Dennison, president of the Dennison Manufacturing Co., of Framingham, Mass. They are conservative, conscientious businessmen, but men who have a social side as well as a business side, men who are concerned with this youth problem, who have studied it, and who say in their report, submitted in December 1939—

> In the light of the facts it is evident that the present provisions made by the Federal Government for unemployed, needy youth who are out of school, are inadequate. If the Federal Government undertook even a reasonably complete program for unemployed youth, the cost would amount to more than $1,000,000,000 a year. The committee recognizes that the immediate appropriation of such an amount is not feasible, but it believes that the existing program of the National Youth Administration can be expanded to the greater advantage of the Nation.

Another gentleman of prominence in this country who represents a considerable part of the workers of this country, has written a letter to me agreeing with these other eminent gentlemen. The letter is dated March 25, 1940, and is as follows:

MARCH 25, 1940.

HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CASEY: The 4,000,000 workers who are enrolled in the Congress of Industrial Organizations have a very deep concern about the welfare of young people, especially those who are unemployed and who cannot go to school. Most such unemployed young people are the sons and daughters of workers.

We feel very strongly that the health, the morale, and the opportunity for a decent livelihood for young people is a matter of the greatest importance in the future welfare of the country. The C. I. O. staff has examined the facts in detail and finds there are between four and five million young people between the ages of 15 and 25 who are out of school and who cannot find a job. Certainly such a condition is a very serious menace to the continued internal stability of our Nation.

The most useful instrument now at hand, in addition to the Civilian Conservation Corps, to meet this problem of unemployed young people is the National Youth Administration. It has blazed a pathway in a direction along which we should continue to move. Therefore I hope that Congress will find it desirable to increase the appropriation for the N. Y. A. considerably above that provided last year. The figure of eighty-five million in the Budget is certainly most inadequate.

The C. I. O. was represented in a conference of a number of distinguished businessmen, educators, and representatives of labor and agriculture. That conference, after examining the facts at considerable length, agreed that no sum less than $1,000,000,000 a year could adequately care for the unemployed youth of the country at present. It pointed out that administrative considerations made it difficult to provide a program using more than $200,000,000 for the N. Y. A. next year, but that such a sum certainly should be appropriated. I wish to endorse that view most heartily.

The needs of the unemployed young people of our Nation transcend partisan considerations. I feel sure that all interests in the Nation would join in approval of a substantial extension of the N. Y. A. program.

Sincerely,

JOHN L. LEWIS.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to confine my remarks this afternoon to the work, the functions, and the activities of the National Labor Relations Board as those activities are related to the appropriation measure now before the House.

I want it distinctly understood that I am not unfriendly to the objectives of the National Labor Relations Act. I voted for the creation of this Board; I voted against the so-called investigation of the National Labor Relations Board; but I do think that the members of the Appropriations Committee of the House have a definite responsibility to curtail expenditures of any Government bureau when it is determined in the minds of that committee that they are not absolutely essential or necessary. If the Appropriations Committee of the House appropriated every dollar that has been authorized by the Congress, we would appropriate $17,000,000,000, and this is something we should bear in mind.

I want to point out what the activities of this Board are, what they are doing, and how they are doing them, and why we should curtail some of their appropriations for the fiscal year 1941.

The National Labor Relations Board was set up by the National Labor Relations Act, which was approved by the President on July 5, 1935.

The purpose of the act is to protect working people in their right to form unions, if they so desire, and to bargain collectively with their employers. The procedure by which that right is attempted to be protected is the ordinary administrative procedure used in other administrative bodies, as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and others.

When charges of violation of the act are filed by a union or an individual an investigation is conducted by the Board's staff and settlement of the controversy effected if possible; if not, report is made to the Board for decision as to whether formal action should be taken.

The formal action, if taken, consists in the issuance of a formal complaint against the employer, alleging that he has violated the act. A formal hearing is had on that complaint. At the hearings the Board's attorney presents the facts in support of the complaint. A trial examiner designated by the Board and sent out from Washington for the occasion moderates the hearing, rules on the admissibility of evidence, and has general charge of the hearing in the same way that a judge or master in chancery would have of a proceeding before him. That trial examiner renders an intermediate report, finding the facts, and recommending the action to be taken in order to bring the situation into compliance with the law. If his recommendation is followed by the party against whom the recommendation is made, and if the other party does not take exception to the recommendation, the case is closed at that point. If he does not comply with the recommendation, or if the other party takes exception, the matter comes before the Board in Washington for its decision. The Board makes its decision upon the basis of a transcript of all of the testimony taken at the hearing.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. PATRICK. Is the gentleman reviewing just one particular case that comes to his knowledge or is this a summation of a great number of cases?

Mr. HOUSTON. This is the action of the Labor Relations Board.

Mr. PATRICK. In one case?

Mr. HOUSTON. Not particularly in one case, but in all of them.

The decision may be that the case is dismissed, which is the end of it. If the Board finds the employer has committed unfair labor practices, it issues an order which usually consists of two parts: First, the negative part, directing the employer to cease and desist from further unfair labor practices of the kind found by the Board; second, the affirmative part of the order, which directs the employer to take affirmative action, such as the reinstatement of employees who were found to have been discharged for union activities and the payment to them of back pay by way of compensation for the lost time. It may also include the disestablishment of a union found to be a company-dominated union.

Generally, certain notices are posted reassuring employees as to their rights under the law, and as to the employer's intention to obey the law.

The Board's orders are not self-enforcing; they do not have the effect of a court judgment. In other words, if the Board has ordered an employer to cease and desist or to reinstate employees, or to do anything else, nothing happens to the employer if he does not obey that order. The Board is still obliged to take the case into the circuit court of appeals of the United States and ask the court to enforce the Board's order.

In the same way, if the Board does not move into the circuit court of appeals to enforce its order but merely lets its order lie and does not go about enforcing it, the statute provides that the employer himself may take the case into court to get the Board's order set aside.

There are two kinds of cases handled by the Board, complaint cases and representation cases. Complaint cases are the unfair labor practice cases in which an employer is charged with having committed violations of section 8 of the act and is proceeded against or is at least charged with that violation. Representation cases are in general terms the election cases where an employer is charged with nothing, but there is a question as to who represents this employer, and the proceeding there is under section 9 of the act.

The total number of cases filed, pending on docket, and disposed of, during the fiscal years 1936 to 1939, inclusive, are as follows:

Cases pending at beginning of 1936, 330; 1937, 2,202; 1938, 3,778; 1939, 4,113.

New cases filed during 1936, 1,068; 1937, 4,068; 1938, 10,430; 1939, 6,904; first 6 months present fiscal year, 3,085.

Total cases disposed of during 1936, 738; 1937, 2,344; 1938, 8,851; 1939, 6,569.

The Board has never been able to handle cases on a current basis, but it now is handling representation cases on that basis by concentrating personnel and time on that branch of the work, and bringing up other cases as they can be reached.

For the purpose of comparing appropriations and estimates for the National Labor Relations Board for 1941 and preceding fiscal years, the following data is given:

APPROPRIATIONS

1936 (supplemental)	$290,000
Supplemental (First Deficiency, 1936)	65,000
1937	735,000
Deficiency	15,000
1938	785,000
Supplemental	1,785,000
1939	2,955,000
1940	3,189,600

ESTIMATES

1936 (supplemental)	$300,000
Supplemental (first deficiency, 1936)	95,000
1937	735,000
Deficiency	15,000
1938	785,000
Supplemental (H. Doc. 294)	65,000
1939	3,035,000
1940	3,229,600
1941	3,180,000

While the Committee on Appropriations did not approve the 1941 Budget estimate in full, the members, after long and careful consideration, tried to arrive at a reasonable figure which will enable the National Labor Relations Board to carry out the program of protection for labor as originally intended by Congress.

It is generally conceded some amendments to the act may be necessary; in fact, certain changes designed to speed up administrative procedure are demanded by labor; but the committee's action in cutting the Budget estimate for 1941 in no way reflects any disposition to hamper the work of the Board. It is believed the approved figure covers the needs of the Board and that by certain plans for more economical operation which the Board is now putting into effect, the Board can function effectively and fulfill its purposes.

The estimates for the National Labor Relations Board total $3,180,000. The committee recommend an appropriation of $2,843,000, or a reduction of $346,600 under the 1940 appropriations and a decrease under the Budget estimate of $337,000. During the current year the appropriation for the Board is carried under one paragraph of salaries and expenses. The committee have separated these two objects of expenditures and provides an appropriation under each head. The committee are of the opinion that the National Labor Relations Board is overstaffed. During the fiscal year 1938, 10,430 cases were received by the Board. In the fiscal year 1939, 6,904 cases were docketed. For the first 6 months of the current fiscal year 3,085 cases were received. On the basis of this record of a continuing reduction in the number of cases received and the firm belief of the committee that both the field service and the departmental service of the Board have entirely too many employees for the work load, the reduction of $337,000 under the Budget estimates has been made. The following table will indicate the thought of the committee as to where the reduction might be made to apply.

Amount of reduction

Field examiners	$18,000
Clerical staff	21,000
Field attorneys	48,000
Administrative Division	20,000
Trial Examining Division	57,000
Division of Economic Research	45,600
Legal Division, Litigation Section	15,400
Legal Division, Review Section	18,000
Reduction in salaries of employees given more than 2-step administrative promotions in 1939	5,000

The committee does not desire it to be understood that in effecting these reductions indicated the Board must necessarily make decreases in the exact amounts indicated in this table, as it is probable that many variations will essentially have to be made from this pattern for the purpose of serving good administration. The table is merely a guide as to the committee's general attitude. It is felt, however, that no need exists for a division of economic research, and it is expected that this section will be entirely eliminated.

In the item for expenses other than salaries, the following table furnishes information as to the committee's attitude:

Suggested reduction

Item of expenditure:
Supplies and materials	$2,000
Communication	20,000
Travel	50,000
Reporting	3,000
Rent	5,000
Special and miscellaneous	500
Furniture and equipment	5,000
Temporary employees	2,500

The same observation may be made respecting these reductions as indicated in the preceding paragraph. If good administration demands that variations be made in the amounts shown above, the committee will entertain no objection. Language has been inserted under this head specifically inhibiting the use of any appropriations for the purpose of influencing any legislation. While this is already the law, the committee is not entirely satisfied that it is being observed as such in all its applications. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD].

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, much of this criticism has been directed to the activities and methods of the National Youth Administration. But no Member has had the temerity to criticize its accomplishments. That it has enabled thousands and tens of thousands of girls and boys to continue their education in high schools and colleges has not been denied. Only the most hidebound reactionary, blind to the conditions in this machine age, can object to an extension of our free educational system that extends help to the poor but ambitious and energetic boy and girl who is struggling to get an education.

It is my hope that today we may rise above prejudice and vote to increase the allocation for N. Y. A. to at least $100,000,000. By doing this we shall bring hope and opportunity to great numbers of our youth now threatened with being denied the chance to complete an education, so vitally essential in this hard world.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, it takes many, many years for a person to establish a good reputation. Reputation is something that cannot be bought. Reputation is something that one can only earn. Those in positions of power, whether political, financial, or otherwise, establish in part their reputation by the manner in which they exercise the great trust that is imposed upon them.

You and I, as Members of Congress, are elected. All of us must have some good qualities in order to commend ourselves to the people of our districts, and all of us are human beings, with the strength and the weaknesses of human beings. One of the powers we have as a Member of this body is the power to make any kind of speech we desire to make on the floor of the House, so long as we do not contravene the rules of this body, rules made to protect one Member against attack by another Member. We also have a constitutional guaranty that protects us in anything that we might say, whether what we say is false to the extreme, or what we might say is true. The very fact that we possess that power imposes upon us a trust to exercise that power with caution and with care, and to see that we do not knowingly or even unknowingly, when erroneously, smear the character and reputation of some other person not a Member of this body, who is unable to come onto the floor of the Chamber and answer the charges. [Applause.]

I was chairman of the special committee 5 years ago that investigated communism, nazi-ism, fascism, and bigoted organizations in this country. As a result of that investigation the committee proposed, and I drafted, and it has since been enacted into law, the registration of foreign propagandists act, an act with which every one of us is familiar. If there is anyone who opposes communism, nazi-ism, fascism, or bigotry in any form in this country, and who is opposed to it, not only in principle, but by heredity and tradition, and because of his own personal desires, then I am that person. I am opposed to all those movements as strongly as anyone can be opposed to them. However, I recognize the right of all men and women to disagree with me, and I recognize their right to entertain the views that their conscience prompts, so long as they respect the rights of all other Americans to entertain their views, and so long as they undertake to accomplish their views in a constitutional manner, and within the law. I take issue with those who would deny me my constitutional rights, and anyone has a right to take issue with me if I should undertake to deny to them their constitutional rights. [Applause.] It is the easiest thing in the world to call names. To me it is a sign of weakness. I have seen men, and I know of men in this chamber, one or two, who 25 or 30 years ago in Massachusetts politics, were called radical by the Republican Party, of which they were a member, and one that I have in mind with whom I served in the constitutional convention over 20 years ago—my first public office—now a member of this body today, whom 20 years ago the Republican Party tried to read out of that party because they considered him to be a radical. As a matter of fact the men I have in mind were progressives. They were called names.

I remember in 1920, my first year in the Massachusetts Legislature, that I voted for old-age pensions, a bill that was pending before the Massachusetts Legislature at that time. Twenty-four members of the house, of a total membership of 240, voted for that bill. I was called a socialist because I voted for old-age pension legislation in 1920. The calling of names is indulged in for the purpose of putting a person in disrepute. Sound argument, although I may not agree with it, I respect, but I think it is unfair for a person to take the floor and call others names, particularly persons who are not members of this body. That is a violation of a great trust and responsibility. The purpose of that is to bring someone else into public disrepute and try to break him down; to try to engender in the minds of others a feeling of fear or hatred against such person or persons who are called names.

So far as the charges made today against Mr. Williams are concerned, while undoubtedly honestly made, they are erroneously made, and whether or not those who made them realize it, they have become a party to a "smear Aubrey Williams campaign." [Applause.] I never met Mr. Williams prior to his becoming associated with the National Youth Administration. I have met the gentleman on several occasions. I think it is wrong to say that a man should be characterized as this or that upon one act or one expression.

I know I would not want to have my whole career judged because of one thing that I did; I repeat, I would not want to be held in judgment upon one act or expression of mine. The fair thing to do is to look over the whole picture, and form an honest opinion, not based on one act or one expression, but based upon a person's career. I would want to be judged that way by my fellow men, and certainly I want to judge my fellow men in the same way that I would want to be judged by them. Mr. Williams made one statement only that by only a stretch of imagination might justify any criticism—certainly not an attack—being made, and that is the statement of group action, made, I think, in Birmingham. I investigated that statement. Mr. Williams has stated that that was an off-the-record statement.

Mr. Williams said it was more of a joking statement. Of course, it was picked up in a little conversation between several who were there, and it was carried in the newspapers.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; of course, I will.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman explain what an off-the-record statement is for a public official?

Mr. McCORMACK. When I used the term "off-the-record" it would be like the gentleman and I were talking out in the anteroom and we made some offhand statement, extemporaneously, without thinking, in a joking way, and if I came in here and charged the gentleman or the gentleman charged me with meaning something that did not represent my state of mind——

Mr. FISH. I am sure, of course, neither the gentleman nor myself would do such a thing.

Mr. McCORMACK. I used the term "off the record" perhaps incorrectly. I mean to say "an offhand statement."

Mr. FISH. But still a public statement.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Is it not true that in the public utterances or even private conversations of a public official a statement is often picked by those unfriendly to him out of its context and twisted to make it mean something entirely different? I certainly agree with you that a man's attitude and character ought in fairness to be judged by his known and recorded acts and words and not by what others may want him to appear.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is true. I would not want to be held in judgment upon some statement that I am alleged to have made and which was carried in the public press.

We have all had the experience, with the press acting in good faith, of being misquoted. That occasionally happens in the life of all public officials. There are times when a portion of a statement is quoted which will convey one impression to a reader and if the whole statement was carried an entirely different impression, as intended, would have been conveyed.

Mr. Williams' life has been one which is distinctly in accordance with the American scheme of life. Born in Alabama, in a family impoverished by the Civil War, he grew up in Birmingham, to which city his parents removed, so I am informed, when he was about a few months old. He went to work in a laundry at the age of 7 years, and, until he was 20 years of age, he did not have what amounted to more than 1 year's formal schooling, having obtained his education on the outside by constant reading, attendance at night school, and tutoring from friends and teachers. From his youth he always manifested a keen interest in social problems and became interested in social work. He aided in establishing a boys' club in Birmingham before he was 20 years of age.

My inquiry as to Mr. Williams' life shows that in 1911, having saved some money, he entered Maryville College, at Maryville, Tenn., and that he had the intention of studying for the ministry, but he later abandoned this ambition in favor of social-service work. He worked his way through Maryville College and entered the University of Cincinnati at about the time the World War broke out in Europe. In 1916 he went to Paris with the Y. M. C. A. and continued his studies in Paris. He later joined the French Foreign Legion. Upon the arrival of American troops, he transferred from the French Foreign Legion to the American Expeditionary Forces and saw active service in a Field Artillery unit and was wounded at the front. Later he was sent to a training camp and was commissioned a lieutenant.

We witness from this brief outline of Mr. Williams' life the story of a man who started out with everything against him and possessed of the ambition to succeed, and through his own courage has succeeded. It is only in a democracy that such opportunity exists. We see Mr. Williams, as 4,000,000 other Americans did, responding to the call of our country for service in time of the World War. We find him after the armistice entering the University of Bordeaux, from which he received a degree in philosophy.

Upon his return to the United States, and for a short time, he performed the services of a lay preacher in a small community across the Ohio River from Cincinnati. We then find him going to Wisconsin as secretary of the Wisconsin Conference on Social Work, and he continued his work in that field for a period of 10 years, when he joined the staff of the American Public Welfare Association in July 1932.

Mr. Williams' services were borrowed from time to time by various States, and in the course of this work he organized the Mississippi Relief Administration and, with Col. Lawrence Westbrook, performed the same service for Texas, both of which tasks were undertaken at the request of the respective Governors of the two States.

In June 1933 he was appointed as field representative in the Southwest of the then Federal Emergency Relief Administration, and has remained with the Government ever since, becoming Deputy Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, in which capacity he served until appointed full-time Administrator of the National Youth Administration in December 1938. Mr. Williams' connection with the National Youth Administration began in 1935 when this agency was created by Presidential order, and he was named by President Roosevelt as executive director, holding this office at the same time that he was Deputy Administrator of the Works Progress Administration.

Mr. Williams is married and has four boys, ages 18, 16, 15, and 13.

Any other Member could have ascertained this information just the same as I have. Certainly, the life and career of Mr. Williams are consistent with the highest ideals of American citizenship. The attacks made upon him are unwarranted and unjustified. Instead of being attacked as he has been, he should be praised for the courage which he has displayed in overcoming great difficulties; for being a self-educated man and for rendering to our country the service that he did during the World War and for devoting his great talents and capacity in the cause of the unfortunate of our country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I propose, when we read the bill, to offer an amendment to increase the appropriation for the Immigration and Naturalization Service from $7,953,600 to $8,133,420. If we are going to economize, I think this is a very poor way to do it. This is breaking down the enforcement of our immigration laws. By this proposed cut you will reduce the force of that division by about 37 immigration inspectors. These are men of high standing, men who are qualified and needed for the important task of guarding our borders, and getting rid of the undesirable aliens in this country that do not belong here.

There was no reason to economize by crippling an arm of the law, by reducing the force of immigration inspectors and clerks in order to save a little over $100,000. I do not think that this is proper and beneficial economy. I do not think the Appropriations Committee was willing to do it. I submit to the membership that both sides of this House should support my amendment to restore at least the law-enforcing arm of the immigration service to the 1939 Budget figures. If you should strike out these 37 inspectors you will break down the law you have been so zealous about enforcing.

There has been a program for deportation of undesirable aliens. By cutting these 37 inspectors from the staff you will permit a lot of undesirables to remain here which in the long run will cost this country more than the salary of 37 inspectors. This should not be made a political question.

I think a reading of the testimony before the committee will show that they were all in sympathy with the fact that this cut should not be made, but because the Budget Bureau said there should be a cut, they dug into the most vital part of the force, which should be left alone. I submit if we are going to economize we should do it in another way and not by removing from office the immigration inspectors who are so necessary at this time, particularly, when the country is in such unrest with all the aliens that are being smuggled into this country by the back door.

Mr. Chairman, there was no justification in the hearings before the Appropriations Committee for cutting one penny of the appropriation for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. As a matter of fact, if I were a member of that committee I should have increased the number of men who are enforcing officers in our Immigration Service in this country.

It has been stated on this floor that the Department of Labor is not enforcing the law in some deportation cases. If we do away with 37 inspectors, some 27 clerks and the 8 additional men who check up on all of these undesirable aliens, we will practically break down the law. I submit it should not be done.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] such time as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has consumed all of his time.

Mr. ENGEL. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma such time as he may desire.

URGES INCREASED FUNDS FOR CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I addressed this House briefly, at which time I pointed out that the proposed slash of more than $56,000,0000 in the appropriation for the maintenance of the C. C. C. camps would close 273 camps in the country. At that time I indicated that an amendment would be offered to restore funds to prevent the closing of these camps.

I rise at this time, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of saying that unless some other Member does so, that I shall present such an amendment. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I offered an amendment to increase the appropriation from $230,000,000 to $280,000,000 when the bill was being considered before the full committee. My amendment was not approved by the committee. If my amendment is adopted when the bill reaches the amendment stage it means that there will still be a sizable reduction under the amount expended for the same camps during the present year, but considering the economies inaugurated and actually made by the efficient and popular Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps, Mr. J. J. McEntee, who has been the Acting Director for the past year, I have reason to believe that with $280,000,000 he could maintain every camp now in operation, which this Congress has made it plain in the past it desires be done.

This effort to close nearly 300 camps is nothing new. Last year it was the same old story. The Bureau of the Budget, which some members seem to think is all-wise and infallible, attempted to make a similar reduction a year ago, but Congress would not stand for it. At that time it was proposed to reduce the number of camps from 1,500 to 1,200 but such a storm of protest went up from Members of Congress that the effort failed. The fact is, that several times during the past 3 or 4 years when threats have been made to liquidate the C. C. C. camps of the country I have called Members of this House together and have led groups to the White House to protest such a move to the President of the United States. A year ago we thought we had a meeting of the minds and that it was generally agreed by Members of Congress and this administration that the number of camps would remain permanently at 1,500. Congress has spoken by an overwhelming majority indicating very clearly that it has placed its stamp of approval upon the Civilian Conservation Corps that is conserving not only the natural resources of the country but, what is far more important, it is conserving and upbuilding the morale of the American youth. [Applause.]

The proposed amendment to increase funds for the maintenance of the C. C. C. at its full strength of 1,500 camps is not a personal matter with me insofar as the camps of the district that I represent in Congress are concerned. Under the proposed reduction I lose no camps, so it does not affect me politically or otherwise. I can speak my mind without being charged with being selfish or biased in the matter. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that if the Conservation Corps program is a practical and progressive program for youth, if it is in fact one of the most popular and worth-while programs of this entire administration, as we fervently believe is the case, then we have no moral right to seriously curtail and cripple that program, and run out on the youth of the country who are so vitally affected by that program. To do so would throw down the needy youth of the country who are clamoring for an opportunity to earn an honest livelihood. If we pass this bill without an amendment, as the committee has recommended, and reduce the appropriation in such a drastic and unreasonable manner as the Budget has reduced it to, let us understand exactly what the result will be.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman explain how many young men will be deprived of employment if the C. C. C. camps are cut?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. We are throwing 54,000 American youth out of employment on or before July 1. Our answer that "we had to cut somewhere," will not be a reason but a flimsy excuse so far as the unemployed youth are concerned.

Not only that, but I will say to my good friend, the distinguished gentleman from Arizona, that if he will read the testimony of Director McEntee before the Subcommittee on Appropriations in charge of this bill, he will find some interesting and amazing facts concerning the subject he has raised about unemployed youth. Mr. McEntee advises that on January 1, 1940, 165,000 eligible youth applied for places as enrollees of the C. C. C. camps of the country but there were vacancies for only 60,000. Bear in mind that every one of those 165,000 unemployed young men and boys were in need; their parents were either on relief, certified for relief, or else had a very low income. Every one of those 165,000 young men had a reason to believe that he was entitled to become an enrollee in a C. C. C. camp but, as I indicated, 105,000 of them on January 1 were told that for reasons of economy there was no place in a C. C. C. camp for them.

I have listened with considerable interest to the repeated statements of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL] in which he castigates officials of the C. C. C. for what he terms as "extravagant overhead." The fact is that the committee that heard the evidence has complemented Mr. McEntee and his associates for his businesslike administration and his economies inaugurated wherever possible to do so. If it is possible to inaugurate economies, and no doubt that can be done, that, of course, would meet with the approval of every Member of Congress. But certainly no real friend of the program wants to see the C. C. C. camps, which have been operated on a high standard, and which have commanded the respect and admiration of Congress and of the citizens of the country, relegated to mere "flop houses," as some are advocating. I would much prefer to see all the C. C. C. camps liquidated than to see a fine program curtailed to the extent that we could not justify their continued existence.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. PITTENGER. The gentleman, I understand, intends to offer an amendment to prevent the abolishing of these C. C. C. camps?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes. As I have heretofore indicated, I shall offer such an amendment unless some other Member desires to do so.

This week I discussed this matter with Hon. J. J. McEntee, Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps, and asked him the direct question, What, in your opinion, would be the effect of the Appropriations Committee action in raising the blocked sum in the Civilian Conservation Corps estimates from $137,130,000 to $143,000,000, and also if 55 additional camps could be effectively and efficiently operated by making the proposed increase in the blocked $137,000,000 to $143,000,000? I am submitting herewith his reply, which is self-explanatory. I trust that every Member interested will read the RECORD. Mr. McEntee makes the blunt statement that the action by the committee is administratively impractical. You will note he states also that if an attempt were made to operate 54 additional camps with a reduced appropriation that it would simply mean the curtailment of proper expenditures for education, training, supplies, equipment, and competent supervisory personnel.

Mr. McEntee's letter also goes into the subject of what is termed "overhead" in some detail. Many Members of Congress apparently are of the opinion that overhead in the C. C. C. camps relates only to the personnel at the camps and the general overhead in connection therewith. But Mr. McEntee in his letter points out that much of this overhead is far removed from the C. C. C. camps. It is back of the lines, so to speak. The overhead includes, as pointed out by Mr. McEntee, not only shelter, meals, medical care, educational facilities and transportation, but also the regional offices of the Park Service, Biological Survey, Reclamation Service, Forest Service, Soil Conservation Service, and the large forces maintained in the Washington offices of these agencies, including the Civilian Conservation Corps salaries and expenses, all of which are paid from Corps funds. Mr. McEntee's letter is plain, clear, and answers a lot of questions that have been asked. His letter follows:

FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY,
CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1940.

HON. JED JOHNSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: This is in response to your direct questions: "What, in your opinion, would be the effect of the Appropriations Committee action in raising the blocked sum in the Civilian Conservation Corps estimates from $137,130,000 to $143,000,000? What is likely to be the effect of the 10-percent-limitation clause put in the appropriation language by the committee? Can 55 additional camps be effectively and efficiently operated due to the increase in the blocked sum from $137,130,000 to $143,000,000?"

Let me first say that I have the highest regard for the abilities and the sincerity of every Member of Congress in endeavoring to reduce expenditures and promote efficiency. However, the action reported will not, in my opinion, accomplish these desirable objectives. The action taken is administratively impractical and will, I fear, seriously interfere with the craftsmanshiplike job the Corps has been performing over the last 7 years.

It will be impossible for the Civilian Conservation Corps to continue the high standards of training to enrollees, work output, and administrative effectiveness under the provision reported out by Appropriations Committee. To operate 55 more camps with no increase in funds simply means that all camps would be very seriously curtailed with regard to proper expenditures for education, training, supplies, equipment, and competent supervisory personnel.

The Civilian Conservation Corps is always seriously concerned with economy in operation and has regularly made progress in that direction. Our costs have been reduced from a maximum of about $1,250 per year to approximately $1,000 per year at the present time. I think that further improvement can and will be made. But a drastic step such as the committee contemplates with its increase in the blocking of funds from $137,000,000 to $143,000,000 is not good economy.

The same thing is, in general, true of the 10-percent limitation which the committee has added to the appropriation language. In addition to other arguments against this 10-percent-limitation clause, it may be stated that the bookkeeping cost or accounting cost of the Civilian Conservation Corps will be considerably increased. These blockages will constitute a separate appropriation in the eyes of the Comptroller General, and the additional accounting work will run into a very large sum. It is our opinion that the recommended changes, if put into effect, would be likely to disrupt the Corps.

There seems to be some misunderstanding, due to the $1,000 per enrollee man-year over-all cost. It is argued that $600 goes to the enrollee directly, and the remaining $400 is, therefore, overhead and is excessive. Perhaps I did not make it entirely clear that this $400 buys all of the materials and equipment used in the work projects; all of the housing and education for enrollees; technical planning and supervision; and many other things which make the program practical and efficient. Any part of this $400 which is taken out simply means poorer educational facilities, poorer housing, inadequate supplies and materials for work projects, and inadequate technical and labor supervision and training for the enrollees. I believe that the recommendations constitute a step backward rather than a step forward in the progress of the Civilian Conservation Corps. In many industries, for each $600 spent for "line labor," thousands of dollars would be spent in materials and all other costs. This would hold with particular force for the motor industry, public utilities, and many other manufacturing operations. In the charge for overhead of the Corps, we have not only the overhead in the camp but the technicians and others back of the lines. In the regional offices of the Park Service, Biological Survey, Reclamation Service, Forest Service, Soil Conservation Service, and the large forces maintained in the Washington offices of these agencies, for example, Civilian Conservation Corps salaries and expenses are paid from Corps funds.

To operate an additional 55 camps on standards which have proved to be practical and acceptable to the public in the past would cost an additional $10,000,000.

You understand, of course, that while I have answered your direct questions and tried to give a clear picture of the probable effect of the recommended changes I fully recognize the right of Congress to enact any legislation it sees fit, and that whatever legislation is enacted I will administer to the best of my ability in accordance with my oath of office.

Sincerely yours,

J. J. MCENTEE, Director.

I am also taking the liberty of submitting a letter from my good friend, Hon. Millard W. Rice, legislative representative of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, who is ever on the battle line fighting for our war veterans. This proposed cut will, of course, mean the elimination of many of the veterans' camps throughout the country. Mr. Rice gives some information and statistics with reference to what the C. C. C. camps are doing especially for veterans. Mr. Rice points out that the fortieth national encampment of the V. F. W. in Boston last September—that great veterans' organization—went on record favoring the increase of the veterans' quota in the Civilian Conservation Corps from 30,000 to 50,000 and provided that veterans should be eligible for immediate reenrollment in the event that private employment obtained by former enrollees should shortly thereafter be terminated. Mr. Rice strongly indicates that he feels that the program of the C. C. C. should be expanded rather than curtailed at this time.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Kansas City, Mo., March 25, 1940.

The Honorable JED JOHNSON,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: During the last several years you have prominently identified yourself as one of those very much interested in securing adequate annual appropriations for the Civilian Conservation Corps, and you have several times taken steps, with the effective cooperation of others, to provide a greater appropriation for that purpose than had been recommended by the House Committee on Appropriations.

H. R. 9007, the proposed Labor-Federal Security Appropriation Act, 1941, recently favorably reported by the House Committee on Appropriations, would provide for an appropriation to the Civilian Conservation Corps of only $230,000,000, as compared with $295,000,000 for the current fiscal year, thus necessitating a reduction in the number of operating C. C. C. camps from 1,500 to 1,282, and thus necessitating a decrease in the average enrollment from 270,000 to 239,600, and incidentally necessitating a proportionate reduction in the number of veteran camps and veteran enrollees, ordinarily constituting about 9 percent of all C. C. C. enrollees.

In the past it has been possible for a considerable number of veterans receiving domiciliary treatment in Veterans' Administration facilities, at a substantial cost to the Federal Government, to become enrollees in C. C. C. camps, and thus to become useful, productive, self-respecting employees, instead of dissatisfied, nonproductive patients in Veterans' Administration facilities.

It seems to be universally agreed that the Civilian Conservation Corps has been responsible for many worth-while construction and conservation projects of permanent value to the Nation and, incidentally, for the physical, psychological, and vocational rehabilitation of thousands of enrollees. These favorable results, amply substantiated by the testimony before the House Committee on Appropriations, would certainly seem to indicate that we ought to have more, rather than less, C. C. C. enrollees and C. C. C. camps.

At our organization's fortieth national encampment, held in Boston, Mass., August 27 to September 3, 1939, it went on record in favor of increasing the veteran quota in Civilian Conservation Corps from 30,000 to 50,000, and to provide that veterans should be eligible for immediate reenrollment in the event that private employment obtained by a former enrollee should shortly thereafter have been terminated.

We are happy to know that you and your associates are going to press for the adoption of an amendment on the House floor to increase the appropriation for the Civilian Conservation Corps from $230,000,000 to at least $280,000,000 for the next fiscal year. We sincerely hope that your efforts in that direction will prove to be successful.

Respectfully yours,

M. W. RICE,
Legislative Representative.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 34 minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the splendid gentleman from Massachusetts who addressed the committee just a few moments ago. I regret that due to limitations of time he was unable to complete those remarks, and I would like to supplement them just a little bit because the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself find ourselves on quite common ground. [Applause.] I simply want to say that I too feel as a result of experience of the past that it is absolutely wrong to stigmatize as a Communist every man who has an idea that does not conform to accepted standards. I think the time is here when the people of the country should differentiate between those men who owe their allegiance to this Nation, but who believe that change in our social and economic structure is necessary and who have the courage to advocate change when it is necessary, and those individuals who owe allegiance to some foreign nation and who are advocating change not for the purpose of preserving our system of government but who in fact want to destroy our system of government. [Applause.] I have known in the past many great liberal minds that have offered legislation to the Nation and to the various States who have been accused of being Bolshevists. That was the name applied to them 25 years ago. Yet today the advocacy of those gentlemen finds expression on the statute books of almost every State in the Union. So it is not with good grace, it seems to me, always to attack as being communistic everything and everybody with which you may not agree. I believe that in my short service in this House I have demonstrated my attitude toward communism and subversive activities.

If I felt for one moment that Mr. Aubrey Williams was a Communist I would be here in the Well of this House denouncing him in no uncertain terms. [Applause.] But I want to say to the membership of this House that I have taken it upon myself as a member of this subcommittee, in the interest of truth, honor, and decency, to investigate Mr. Williams in my own way; and I can say to you on my oath as a Member of this House that while I do not agree with some of his expressed philosophy I do know that Aubrey Williams is not a Communist, and it is unfair even to give that implication to the public. [Applause.]

It seems to me a man's past record, which is a thing all of us like to point to, ought to be given some consideration as proof. Aubrey Williams has been referred to as a cultured, educated, refined gentleman. The fact of the matter is he had no schooling at all until he was 20 years of age. Whatever Aubrey Williams has accomplished in life he has accomplished the hard way as a result of his own self-education. He did go to the University of Cincinnati and study for the ministry, but he left that effort at education in order to go to France representing the Y. M. C. A., and then joined the Foreign Legion and went to the front to fight in the World War. When the United States entered that war Aubrey Williams joined the American Expeditionary Forces and remained at the front until the conclusion of the hostilities. For me, at least, I think perhaps his record is one reason why the American Legion in my State and all of the patriotic organizations have unalterably expressed their opinion in letters which I have in my files commending the work of the N. Y. A.

It may be that Mr. Williams has made some unfortunate statements. Who has not? Who is there here who has not made statements in public life that he has not afterwards perhaps regretted? I know I have and I would hate to have my career put under the microscope of public inspection as has been the career of Mr. Aubrey Williams. At least let us understand, Mr. Chairman, that we must judge the work of Mr. Williams by what he has done in N. Y. A. So far as I am concerned I am judging the worth of that experiment or that organization by what it has done in my State.

The administrator of N. Y. A. in Wisconsin is a past post commander of the American Legion, and every man in the organization that I know of is an American of the very highest standards with the most patriotic impulses motivating his every action. [Applause.] N. Y. A. has brought relief to 20,000 young people in the State of Wisconsin who are being given an opportunity to work. This is not a subsidy out of the Treasury of the United States given to youth; it is an appropriation that provides an opportunity to work. These young people who are kept in colleges and schools have to work for the opportunity of remaining in school, and the pitifully small amounts that are allocated to them for that work represents a bare sustenance, but it does represent the difference between an education and the lack of an education. In the out-of-school work which I have seen in my State it has trained young people for jobs, and thousands have been placed in private employment due to the training they have received in N. Y. A. Let us be fair in the discussion of this situation and let us not try to get away from the fact and the real problem that is before us, let us try not to assassinate N. Y. A. over the body of Aubrey Williams. [Applause.]

The only question that should be before this House is the simple question: Are you going to support the action of the committee which reported the full Budget estimate of $85,000,000 or are you going to increase or decrease this amount? This is the privilege and prerogative of the membership of this House. I think, however, it is passing strange that those Members of this body who so bitterly assail and condemn Aubrey Williams because of his association with Mr. Leopold Stokowski in the organization of this American orchestra lose sight of the fact—and I am addressing my remarks to those gentlemen on the Democratic side especially who condemn Mr. Williams in this connection.

They lose sight of the fact that Mr. Stokowski was a guest at the White House when the matter was discussed, and that the Stokowski proposal has the complete and sympathetic approval of the White House itself. In condemning Stokowski and his program as a communistic activity, my Democratic friends are in effect condemning the White House itself.

Now, bear in mind that we went into the question of Leopold Stokowski thoroughly. If Leopold Stokowski is a Communist, I do not know anything about that. I do know that he is an acknowledged leader, and has been for years, of one of the greatest symphony orchestras in America. I know that he is a great musician and has made a great contribution to the culture of this country. I know nothing of his morals or his habits, but I have no fear that he or anyone else will be able to contaminate the youth of this country. When Mr. Williams, under the direction and approval, if you please, of the administration, expended a little sum of about $2,600 to provide auditions throughout the Nation through the medium of N. Y. A., so that every young aspiring musician might be heard and have a chance to get employment in this project, it comes with poor grace, in my opinion, to criticize and stigmatize that movement as being of Communist origin. [Applause.]

The people of Wisconsin whom I represent believed in the N. Y. A. when they learned the truth and I have hundreds of telegrams from as sound Republicans as there are in the State of Wisconsin urging me to support the N. Y. A. to the fullest extent. I cannot conceive why this argument should be diverted from the real problem, which is the problem of youth, that I know exists and you know exists. Whether their problem has been created by the New Deal or created in some other way is beside the question right now. We are facing a reality, we are facing a fact which is known to exist. There are 1,200,000 young American youth who are struggling for an opportunity to become part of the N. Y. A., while only about 300,000 can be taken care of.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would like to ask my colleague if this did not occur during the hearings when we were all present: The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] asked for the list of the executive committee that was sponsoring Mr. Stokowski's proposed trip and the following names were enumerated in the RECORD: Mrs. Samuel Conner, Shoreham Hotel, Washington; Dr. L. S. Rowe, Director General, Pan American; Mr. Colby Chester, president, General Foods; Mr. Thomas McInnerney, president, National Dairy Products; Mr. William S. Paley, president, Columbia Broadcasting System; Mr. Joseph Sharfin; and many others.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman is absolutely correct. The sponsors of this movement, as the evidence appears in the record, and I am used to relying on evidence and not hearsay in my actions as a lawyer at least, are clearly shown to be men of high integrity and none of them could in any way be classed as being connected with subversive activities or communism.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. How many people are actually on N. Y. A. now and how many will be taken off as the result of this cut?

Mr. KEEFE. I think I can give the gentleman those figures. If he will turn to the hearings, he will find on page 614 the testimony of Mr. Williams as to just exactly what would happen. That testimony discloses there would be a reduction of 123,000 young people from the average monthly employment of the whole program; 45,000 will have to be dropped from the out-of-school program; 57,000 from the high-school program; and 21,000 from the college program. It actually means a reduction of 16.6 percent.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that all we have to determine here is, Are we going to vote the appropriation the committee brought before the House, which is the full Budget estimate, or are we going to increase it or decrease it? The thing I am unable to understand in this picture is why we do not have an honest Budget submitted to this Congress. I am just as satisfied as I know I am standing in the Well of this House, that the people in charge of the preparation of this Budget fully expect that that Budget will be increased above $85,000,000.

If they manifested that expectation and harbored that thought at the time this Budget was approved, why not bring an honest Budget here and let the President of the Nation say, "I think we ought to have $100,000,000 for N. Y. A.," instead of reducing it to $85,000,000 in the hope that some Member of Congress will have the courage to ask to have it put at $100,000,000, and, in fact, I think I am safe in saying from what I know that the White House itself would like to see this appropriation set at $100,000,000. If this is true, why was it not put in the Budget originally and why place the burden and responsibility upon the Appropriations Committee for doing that very thing?

I could call attention to an appropriation in the public-health program for the eradication and control of venereal disease which the Bureau of the Budget cut to $3,000,000. The authorization was $7,000,000. The present expenditure is $5,000,000. You and I and every member of this Committee knows the White House expects that budgetary estimate ultimately, either here or in the Senate, to be put at $7,000,000. Why not bring an honest Budget to the Congress and why does not the President at least tell us that he would like to see this appropriation $7,000,000, instead of having the Bureau of the Budget reduce it to $3,000,000, then expect us to take the load by raising the appropriation up to five or seven million dollars?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman also have any conviction as to what the White House expects us to do with reference to the item for the C. C. C.?

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I am frank to say that the same thing may be said in reference to the C. C. C.

Mr. ENGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ENGEL. Does the gentleman also recall that the White House expects us to levy a tax to make up the difference between the amount of the Budget and the amount that we raised the Budget?

Mr. KEEFE. Exactly. Now, due to the fact these figures have not yet appeared in the testimony and the argument, I would like to call attention to the fact that this N. Y. A. in its first 3 years of operation came as the result of an Executive order issued by the President himself. The first 3 years of expenditures were made from earmarked funds in the relief appropriation. In 1939 they had nearly $75,000,000, in 1940, $99,979,000, and the Budget estimate for 1941 is $85,000,000. An average of the appropriations for the last 2 years would be $87,000,000.

I want to say one other thing that I believe should be said, and I hope the people of America get this point firmly in their minds. I was astounded today to have two gentlemen tell me on the floor of this House that they thought the N. Y. A. and the American Youth Congress were one and the same thing, and that they were opposed to the N. Y. A. because Mrs. Roosevelt, it is alleged, entertained in the White House members of the American Youth Congress, which is a Communist organization. Let it be said once and for all so the Members of this House and the people of the country may know that there is absolutely no connection between the N. Y. A. and the American Youth Congress. Not a single member of the American Youth Congress has been selected by the N. Y. A. for work or for a position in the N. Y. A.

With respect to the 22 or 23 clerks that were referred to as being employed by the American Youth Congress, I looked into the facts in reference to that matter and found that the statement is true. When the American Youth Congress had its convention here the N. Y. A. furnished some 22 young people to assist in doing the clerical work in connection with that movement, but just as soon as the Administrator found that the American Youth Congress was considering resolutions affecting legislation in the Congress, these 22 employees of the N. Y. A. were immediately withdrawn. I am assured that there are no employees of the N. Y. A. in any way associated with the American Youth Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Is it not true that Mr. Aubrey Williams, the Administrator of the N. Y. A., has privately and publicly criticized the American Youth Congress, and is it not also true that the Youth Congress has criticized Aubrey Williams and hissed his name?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. I have in my file a record which I took from the Boston Globe, showing the report of a speech made by Mr. Aubrey Williams in February, in which he very severely attacked the American Youth Congress. I also have records of speeches in which he replied to the American Youth Congress when it condemned him and hissed him because he turned over to the War and Navy Departments a list of N. Y. A. employees who might be interested in receiving the recruiting bulletins from the branches of our military and naval service. Mr. Williams is in disrepute with the American Youth Congress. He perhaps is in the same kind of disrepute that Dorothy Thompson is now with the C. I. O. because of her alleged misstatement of the number of unemployed.

There has been a lot of talk here about the Wage and Hour Division, and I address myself now to the chairman of the Committee on Labor, who took occasion this afternoon to excoriate the Committee on Appropriations generally because they have attempted to legislate on appropriation bills. I have no quarrel with the gentlewoman from New Jersey, who is chairman of that committee, but I may say that where there is a demand throughout this country that there be legislation that will affect some of the inequalities and injustices of the wage and hour law—inequalities and injustices which Mme. Perkins, testifying before our committee, admitted exist; inequalities and injustices which Colonel Fleming admitted exist—it seems to me the Committee on Labor ought to respect the right of the people of his country to have these injustices corrected at once, and such legislation ought to be brought before the House as will correct the injustices that admittedly exist.

The only reason it is not here is, perhaps, as has been stated publicly and stated in our hearings, that if a bill were permitted to come before this House, the duly elected Representatives of the people, who have been elected to come here and legislate, would so emasculate the bill and tear it to pieces that they might destroy it.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. Does not the gentleman know that the Committee on Labor did bring out such a bill, and that the bill was held up by the Committee on Rules? I believe the gentleman ought to be acquainted with some of the facts in the case before criticizing the Committee on Labor.

Mr. KEEFE. May I say to the gentlewoman that I am fully aware of the facts, but the bill which the gentlewoman's committee reported does not take care of the injustices and inequalities about which complaint has been made.

Mrs. NORTON. Is the gentleman quoting his personal opinion? If he examines the bill reported by the Labor Committee, he will find it does take care of injustices and inequalities.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. In just a moment, when I finish this observation.

The statements of the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Labor and the chairman of the committee were very obviously designed to make it appear to the public and to this House that the Committee on Appropriations has attempted to emasculate this bill and the work of the Wage and Hour Division by reducing its appropriation. May I say to the Members of the House that you ought to read the colloquy that took place between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] on the floor of the House yesterday. It is unfortunate there were so few Members present at the time. If you will read that colloquy and then read the testimony in the hearings you will find that we have not reduced the appropriation of the Wage and Hour Division but have increased it $1,600,000-odd above the appropriation of last year. Therefore, when the contention is made that they are going to have to discharge employees wholesale down there, they are making statements that do not accord with the facts because we are giving them $1,600,000-odd more than they had last year.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. May I say that the committee stands condemned in the language of its report on page 13 that it is attempting to legislate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. KEEFE. I do not find any legislation in the bill because of the language that the gentlewoman from New Jersey talks about in the report. I do not think that language in the report constitutes legislation, and the gentlewoman from New Jersey knows that.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. As a matter of fact, the Wage and Hour Division has been delayed in its appointment of inspectors due to the fact that they have not had the certification of names from the Civil Service Commission, but they have contemplated the appointment of a number of inspectors based upon their 1940 budget, plus the deficiency budget that they have, and if they do not get the full amount of the budgetary estimate, if it is slashed by $1,000,000, as the gentleman's committee recommends, that means they will have an opportunity to appoint 350 less inspectors than they require.

Mr. KEEFE. That is exactly the situation, and I am glad the gentleman made that very plain.

Mr. HEALEY. Let me make this further statement in view of what the gentleman has said——

Mr. KEEFE. I do not yield further. I am glad the gentleman has made that observation. I think the gentleman has clarified the situation himself. The contention is very clear and definite that the discharge will be made in the field of those people whom they expect to hire rather than those who are already on the pay roll.

Mr. HEALEY. Now, the gentleman should yield if he wants to be fair about that.

Mr. KEEFE. It cannot be any other way, and I do not want to be interrupted at this time. The record very clearly shows, without question, that the Wage and Hour Division has not employed the number of inspectors that their 1940 appropriation provided for. They could still appoint some 30 or 40 inspectors in the last fiscal year, or right now, and they have not appointed them, and we have given them $1,600,000 more that they could go to work with in the next fiscal year. So do not create the impression or let the impression go out that you are going to discharge employees.

Mr. GROSS and Mr. HEALEY rose.

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSS. May I just say that they may well cut that appropriation to the Wage and Hour Division. For your information, recently they had an inspector in my district with a stop watch leaning over women making cigars and timing them and saying, "Why can't you roll cigars faster?"

and a certain woman said, "If you would go to hell I could work a lot faster." [Laughter.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. There is really a very good reason why the Wage and Hour Division has not appointed more inspectors. The Civil Service has been slow, for various reasons, in certifying these people for these appointments. Many of us believe in the Civil Service. We voted it into the wage and hour law.

Mr. KEEFE. Let me ask the gentlewoman a question.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. We want to see the law enforced.

Mr. KEEFE. And I would like the gentlewoman to answer it some other time, but not in my time now, but the gentlewoman can answer it in the RECORD. What do you think your Appropriations Committee is for? Do you think they should give study to this problem? Do you think they should analyze these requests for appropriations? Do you think they should intelligently try to conserve public funds where they can, and does not the gentlewoman think that your appropriations subcommittee, consisting of four Democrats and two Republicans, who have given several months of intensive study to this proposition and the requests for appropriations, should at least have an opportunity to know whether these additional jobs are necessary, in an attempt to preserve the integrity of our Treasury? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that your subcommittee has done a good job——

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not care to yield right at this time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may submit a unanimous-consent request that I may offer a reply to the gentleman's questions at this point in the RECORD?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not want it taken out of my time and I do not yield at this time.

Now, it is manifestly unfair to charge the members of the Appropriations Committee, the subcommittee, or the full committee, with being opposed to the principle of the Wage and Hour Act. I am heartily in sympathy with it. I am heartily in sympathy with the program, the principle, and the objectives of the National Labor Relations Act, but when we made the appropriations for the National Labor Relations Board we certainly had to make some inquiry as to whether all of the employees were necessary, and when we cut its research department, we did so with full knowledge of what we were doing, not with the idea of crippling that department, but with the idea of conserving public funds and all the information that that department could furnish is available at all times in the Department of Labor through the instrumentality of their research bureaus that are doing the same thing.

If we are ever to get back to any sanity in government we have got to begin to trim some of these appropriations, and somebody's toes some place along the line, are going to be stepped on and a howl is going to go up; and unless you have somebody here that can stand for some decent economy in government, God knows where we are going, and every one of you tell me that, privately, when I talk with you. You ought to give expression here on the floor publicly to the same things that you state privately. Your Appropriations Committee has attempted in the consideration of this bill to do justice to all of these agencies. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired; the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the offices and bureaus of the Department, for which appropriations for contingent and miscellaneous expenses are not specifically made, including the purchase of stationery, furniture, and repairs to the same, carpets, matting, oilcloths, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, laundry, not exceeding $1,400 for streetcar fares; purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of motorcycles and motortrucks; maintenance, operation, and repair of three motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes; freight and express charges; commercial and labor-reporting services; newspaper clippings not to exceed $1,400; postage to foreign countries, telegraph and telephone service, typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices; purchase and exchange of lawbooks, books of reference, newspapers, and periodicals, and, when authorized by the Secretary of Labor, dues for library membership in societies or associations which issue publications to members only or at a price to members lower than to subscribers who are not members, not exceeding $5,300; contract stenographic services; teletype service and tolls (not to exceed $1,100); rent and maintenance of buildings in the District of Columbia; all other necessary miscellaneous expenses not included in the foregoing; and not to exceed $25,000 for purchase of certain supplies for the Immigration and Naturalization Service; in all, $347,500: Provided, That section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5) shall not be construed to apply to any purchase or service rendered for the Department of Labor when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $100.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of discussing a matter which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] just mentioned, in which he referred to the statement I made yesterday and to the colloquy between my colleague the gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER, and myself. I have since made further investigation of the matter of the appropriation for the Wage and Hour Division and requested that Division to give me an explanation of the situation from their point of view. They have sent me the following:

The cut in the 1941 budget of the Wage and Hour Division would have the following effects:

(1) It would prevent the expansion of the Division in accordance with the 1940 Budget. The expenditure of 1940 funds was planned on a monthly increment basis. If the Division expanded according to plan, the total personnel on the pay roll on June 30 could not be carried during the 1941 fiscal year on the reduced amount proposed by the committee.

(2) It would require the discharge of employees now working for the Division. The recruitment of inspectors has been retarded by the necessity of setting up civil-service lists. Other branches of the Division have been able to expand to their June 1940 personnel already. It will therefore be necessary to discharge employees in these branches of the Division in order to have an inspection staff proportionate to the rest of the Division.

(3) The Appropriations Committee slash equals roughly 460 inspection personnel and 30 legal personnel.

It appears to me, from what I can make of the controversy which has arisen here, that the committee is partly right in its position and that I am partly right in mine. The information which I used yesterday, and which was furnished me by the Wage and Hour Division, was partly misleading, I think. It is true, however, or at least they contend it is true, because they have recruited their legal personnel and some other parts of their Division up to the 1940 level, but they will have to discharge some of those if the appropriation recommended by the committee is carried out; but, so far as I am personally concerned, I am not going to offer any amendment to increase the amount. I bow to the wisdom of the Committee on Appropriations in determining how fast they shall expand. I do say this about this statement: That I do not agree with the reasons assigned for the failure to recruit the inspection service up to the amount allowed. The Civil Service Commission months ago gave the Wage and Hour Division the right to employ temporary inspectors. Therefore it is not the fault of the Civil Service Commission if they have not employed those permitted by the present appropriation, and they ought not to blame it on the Civil Service Commission.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I understand that the slash made by the Committee on Appropriations will compel a drop of 460 of the inspection personnel and 30 of the legal personnel.

Mr. RAMSPECK. There will be that many less than they would have had if they had gotten the extra appropriation which the committee has not seen fit to grant.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It was the inspectors from the Wage and Hour Division who were responsible for finding out the violations of law on the part of the Bata Shoe Co., of Belcamp, Md. Previous to that time this same company had been forced to make restitution of $7,000 on account of violation of the wage and hour law in the warehouse in Chicago. That shows conclusively the need for enforcement of the law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I read something about that in the paper.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Is it not true that even some of the employees now employed by this organization will have to be discharged?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; in the legal division that is true, and perhaps some clerical employees, in order to make the division proportionate to the number of inspectors they are permitted to have under this recommended appropriation.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. The only reason I take time in response to the statements made by my colleague from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] and others, is to call attention of the Committee to information contained in the hearings, which may be helpful to them in arriving at a conclusion in respect to this matter. I have no greater interest in the wage and hour section of the appropriation bill than has any other Member of the House.

There has been no purpose on the part of members of the subcommittee to do otherwise than to make reasonable provision for the activities of this Division in the light of the evidence brought before us.

May I call attention to page 360, volume 1 of the hearings. Yesterday I called your attention to pages 345 and 346, but on page 360 you will find some information which ought to be somewhat enlightening. Under the heading "1940, personnel on duty or appointments pending," that in the field organization in the Wage and Hour Administration, appear the figures 868. Under the heading "1940, being recruited, funds available," appear the figures 757. Under the heading "1941, additional positions," appear the figures 411. Under heading "1941, total positions," appear the figures 2,019.

In other words, the Wage and Hour Division now has 868 employees in the field forces. It is authorized to recruit and is engaged in recruiting 757 additional employees who have not yet been employed. It contemplates recruiting those employees during the balance of this fiscal year. Then it contemplates adding 411 more in addition to the 757 in the next fiscal year, making the total number of its field personnel, as contemplated by Budget estimates for the next fiscal year, 2,019, as against 868 now employed.

It would be very apparent to anyone who reads the hearings with a desire to find out what the true facts may be, that there is not only not any reduction of personnel in the employment contemplated by the provisions contained in the pending bill, but that the appropriations contained in the bill will be sufficient to very considerably enlarge the existing personnel.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Traveling expenses: For all traveling expenses, except traveling expenses incident to the deportation of aliens, under the Department of Labor, including all bureaus and divisions thereunder, $1,544,000.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. NORTON: On page 3, line 15, strike out "$1,544,000" and insert "$1,684,000."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, one of three, all of which are intended to restore the appropriation recommended by the President.

I realize the difficult position in which the Appropriations Committee finds itself in attempting to cut appropriations in order to conform to the clamor of public opinion, and at the same time play fair with the citizens of this country who will, in the final analysis, be the sufferers of this particular type of economy.

We listened to the able address of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON], who attempted to defend the action of the committee in reducing the appropriation recommended by the President, which was $7,486,000, or $230,000 less than the annual rate that was contemplated last July, or a reduction of $1,034,000. This in face of the fact that the Wage and Hour Division has planned its whole enforcement program around the basis of annual expenditures of $7,486,000. And these plans, as Colonel Fleming said, call for only a 70-percent enforcement job this year—page 345, hearings.

This fact was apparently understood by the Appropriations Committee when the representatives of the Wage and Hour Division appeared before the subcommittee of the House in July 1939. Of course, if it is the wish of the Committee to curtail the division's personnel by from 300 to 500 persons, which this reduction would probably necessitate, depending upon the extent to which Colonel Fleming can make readjustments in his present plans, the obvious fact confronts us that the 93 percent of industries against which the division has received no complaints, and which we hope are conforming to the law will be obliged to compete with the chiseling 7 percent. This, in round figures, represents well over 300,000 plants or businesses, and around 12,000,000 workers, who will be denied the protection of the law they are entitled to—all because a small percentage of them cannot be made to comply. These people are your constituents and mine. Is this a fair proposition? To betray the trust of these hundreds of thousands of employers and these millions of workers who accept this act as the law of the land. A new law, particularly one dealing with people to the extent this is must, of necessity, have many growing pains, but is it fair to make the obvious more difficult by throwing monkey wrenches into the machinery?

Is it not a fact that because certain groups are opposed to the law, a method is being introduced to create trouble in its enforcement? Are not the administration forces being penalized for what is not their fault? I say this because of a paragraph in the report on page 13, under the caption Wage and Hour Division, which reads, and I quote:

The committee recognize the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act. They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only serve in lending further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.

Strange logic, indeed! It would seem more like revenge. In effect, it merely serves notice on the 25,000 industries not conforming with the law that the force of investigators will be crippled to such an extent—they need not worry—that the millions of workers included in the benefits of the act will not receive the benefit Congress intended they should receive. In other words, it is one method of crippling the administration of the law. This, too, in the face of the fact that a new Administrator has but recently taken charge of the Wage and Hour Division. And even those opposed to the law admit that Colonel Fleming is doing a fine job. Why handicap his work then by curtailing his inspection force to the extent of several hundred men?

I notice under the caption Women's Bureau, page 12, the committee saw fit to provide an added $3,000 to the Budget estimate in order that a survey might be made of the candlewick bedspread industry in the South, an industry in the district of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]. I have no objection to the gentleman getting the three thousand, but I would like the committee to be consistent, and I note in another paragraph where women's organizations appearing before the committee in support of a program to have the Women's Bureau conduct a study of household employment—certainly the largest field of feminine endeavor in the country, and much larger than the candlewick industry—they were denied this study on the grounds of economy. Apparently it makes a great difference as to who is being affected by the economy.

If, as has been indicated to me, the reduction in this Wage and Hour Division appropriation was intended as a whip over the Labor Committee because it refused to exempt from the provisions of the act a great group of industrial workers who were being paid sweatshop wages, it would seem a very stupid and unfair procedure. It is true lack of funds will curtail enforcement, but in the final analysis the 93 percent mentioned by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON], as conforming to the provision of the law, will be penalized by the 7 percent who refuse to conform. And it is this 7 percent who are the real slave drivers in industry.

I do not like to think this committee has failed in its obligation to a great group of workers in the sweated industries of this country. I would rather think it would attempt to curtail expenditures where the result would not cause so much human suffering.

I beg the committee to support this amendment in order that the underpaid sweated workers of this country may receive in wages what Congress intended they should receive when we passed this great humanitarian law for their protection.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment just presented by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mr. Chairman, the recommendations of this committee would curtail the budgetary estimate for the Wage and Hour Division by over a million dollars. I do not know whether the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] is present now or not, but I tried to take issue with the gentleman when he was on the floor. Aside from a short colloquy he would permit no further interruption to receive my answer in response to a statement he made. However, I want to say to the gentleman that the Wage and Hour Division definitely states that if this budgetary estimate is cut by the proposed $1,035,000, it will result in the discharge of employees now employed by that Division, because the recruitment of inspectors has been retarded by reason of setting up a civil-service list, and other branches have been able to expand to their June 1940 personnel already. It will therefore be necessary to discharge employees in this branch of the Division in order to have the inspection staff proportionate to the rest of the Division.

In other words, the inspectors in the field serve as the arms, ears, and eyes of the Division and supply the material on which the work of all the other employees depends. It is therefore absolutely necessary that an efficient ratio be maintained between the number of inspectors and the number of other employees. If a reduction in one branch upsets that ratio, efficiency compels a proportionate reduction in the other branch. So that if the full budgetary sum is not provided employees now serving in this Division will have to be discharged. The only motive advanced by this committee that I have been able to find for this cut is contained on page 13 of the committee report.

Quoting from that report they say:

> The committee recognize the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act.

They admit the necessity for increased personnel, by that statement. But they say further:

> They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure, and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only serve in lending further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.

That is the motive that is advanced for this cut in the appropriations, and if it does not amount to recommending legislation then I do not know what other interpretations one could place on that language.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEALEY. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, in one paragraph they admit the necessity, yet in the next paragraph they say, "But you do not get it unless you change the law." In other words it amounts to blackjacking labor legislation.

Mr. HEALEY. It is a negative limitation. It is an effort to coerce legislative committees of Congress by indirection and subterfuge, by coming in the back door instead of resorting to the forthright process of submitting legislative proposals to the regular standing committees established for the specific purpose of considering legislation. The Committee on Appropriations was not organized for such purpose. In this instance the committee is employing an indirect method of attack on the functioning of this act which Congress after deliberating for many months finally overwhelmingly wrote into law. Now the effort is being made to cripple this act by curtailing this inspection force and other forces depending upon it and thus prevent a proper administration of this law. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to repeat. But as it has been said here many times today we have increased this appropriation over and above the appropriation for the current fiscal year by $1,644,000. The adoption of this amendment would mean the addition of $140,000 to the committee's increase.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. No—my time is too limited.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Will not the gentleman yield on this particular point?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield at this point.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to page 389 of the hearings, the item for travel expense:

> Mr. TARVER. Coming now to your travel-expense item, it is estimated your travel allocations for the next fiscal year will be $1,000,000, as against $650,000 for the present fiscal year.
> Colonel FLEMING. Yes, sir. We figure our costs for inspectors at $1,000 per individual, plus several other related items.

There is an addition to the travel item alone of $350,000 which gives them an increase of $260,000 above the present year.

The committee has never admitted, so far as I know, that any increase in the appropriation was necessary. Had we thought it necessary we would have made the increase in the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we cannot reach some agreement as to time on this amendment. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes, the committee to have the last 5 minutes.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like a couple of minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I modify my request to 17 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 17 minutes?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the Committee on Appropriations is confronted with the task of effecting economies wherever possible, but I submit that economy with regard to the people benefited by the Wage and Hour Act affects the class of people least able to defend themselves.

A great many people seem to believe that exploitation of workers is confined to one section of the country. This is not the case. None of us can point with pride to conditions in his own State. Because I have been interested primarily in my own State I have looked up some statistics regarding Pennsylvania and other States in the East and West with regard to the activities of the Wage and Hour Division. Six hundred and ninety thousand workers in this country were receiving wages below 30 cents an hour. One hundred and fifty thousand of these workers were located in New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, and the New England States. Thirty-six thousand of these workers were in my own State of Pennsylvania. Raising the wages of these workers to 30 cents an hour has meant an hourly increase in their purchasing power, collectively, of $1,800 in the State of Pennsylvania alone. In 1 year this amounted to $3,744,000. In the State of New York it amounted to $3,057,000.

One million six hundred and sixty-three thousand workers in the United States now receive time and a half for overtime. The Wage and Hour Division forced the payment of time and a half for overtime work. To avoid that meant the employment of many who would otherwise remain unemployed, for if these employers did not want to pay time and a half for overtime to get the work done they had to employ additional workers. This has had a very direct effect upon the relief rolls and upon appropriations for the Work Projects Administration.

It is necessary to inspect 22,000 establishments in the United States to prevent chiseling. In the States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin and the New England States are located 10,000 of these establishments. In Pennsylvania alone there are 1,526 such establishments.

The total number of cases closed by the Wage and Hour Division in and out of court total so far 1,631. Of these 222 were in my own State of Pennsylvania and in the States I have just mentioned, including Wisconsin, they total 724, or very nearly 50 percent. During the past month there has been only an average of 35 cases closed for each region as against 160 cases being reported.

You can see from this how necessary it is to have more efficient inspection. Restitution in the way of back wages for the first year was $200,000. In February of this year the total amount of restitution was $800,000 and it is estimated that $3,000,000 is the amount which still must be returned to workers in plants where the law has been violated.

There is need for additional inspectors in the field. There are 898 at present, and if the appropriation recommended by the Budget Bureau had been adhered to by the committee, it would be possible to employ 459 additional inspectors, which is the minimum estimated as absolutely necessary for the proper enforcement of this act. In Chicago a hairpin manufacturer was paying over 900 home workers less than 3 cents per hour. May I ask if anyone who wishes to curtail this appropriation is in favor of such conditions continuing?

Ten of the largest manufacturers of knitted goods in the country located in an area from Maine to Tennessee resorted to subterfuge in an attempt to evade the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. They established an "institute," sold materials to 10,000 home workers, and then bought back from them as "contractors" the finished product. These operations were on a very large scale in the State of Pennsylvania. These employers were compelled to make restitution to the tune of $250,000. The workers in these plants were receiving less than 5 cents per hour.

The Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. recently entered a consent decree to make restitution and to pay overtime in the future to warehouse employees in 76 cities throughout the country.

In Philadelphia, in September 1939, a Federal grand jury returned an 18-count indictment against the Jewel Manufacturing Co., of that city, for violations of the act and also for falsification of their records. One woman employee testified she had received only 76 cents for 44 hours' work. Another worked for a flat rate of 12½ cents per hour for 12 and 14 hours a day. On December 8 this firm pleaded guilty on all counts. The Crown Trouser Co., of Pennsylvania, was compelled to refund $3,000 to 160 employees in Philadelphia when it was discovered the act was being violated.

The group of American citizens who are benefited from proper enforcement of the wage and hour law receive less benefits from America than any other class of people. They are defenseless against those who would exploit them, and unless there is rigid and efficient enforcement of this law, the opportunities which America boasts it offers to its citizens will mean very little to them. We appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for other agencies, very often with little debate, and in this instance we quibble about $1,000,000 to be expended for the benefit of hundreds of thousands of American workers, who, perhaps, share less in the billions which the Government spends than does any other group. It is a poor argument to insist that we must economize at their expense to the extent of a million dollars when next week we will, perhaps, be appropriating several hundred millions of dollars for some other agency of the Government and for benefits to agricultural groups.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will restore the Budget estimate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to answer the question which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] asked me. He asked if I did not think it important and helpful to have a committee to study appropriations and to keep them as low as possible. I consider that most important, of course, and I have followed the various appropriation subcommittees in their efforts to cut expenses as much as possible, but also I want to remind the gentleman that all of us here have a duty to perform and we want to perform that duty wisely. Many of us also have made a study of this particular problem. I have studied it for months. I was very interested in helping to secure an increase in the appropriation last year for wage and hour inspectors and the fact that the Department has not used as many inspectors as it might have under that appropriation means only that the Department is living up to the civil-service law. It has been slow in making appointments because the Civil Service, which is greatly overworked, has been very tardy in certifying persons to the Wage and Hour Division.

May I call the gentleman's attention also to the fact that only this month the Wage and Hour Division had to refer to the Department of Justice the violation of the Bata Shoe Co. at Belcamp, Md. This firm had previously been forced to make restitution of $7,000 on account of violation of the law in connection with its warehouse in Chicago. This case only serves to focus attention in the need for continuous and vigorous enforcement. Those of you who have industries in your districts realize very well that since the wage-hour law became effective not nearly so many industries have left your States, which is a healthy condition for the district in which they operate and helpful to the industry and most helpful to the employees.

Mr. Chairman, I want to quote a statement by Mr. Frederick A. Miller, chairman of the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association and president of the H. C. Godman Co., of Columbus, Ohio, at the thirty-fourth annual convention of the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association held in Chicago:

> It seems a self-evident fact that the best interests of the entire industry will be most constructively served by a fair and impartial but complete and thorough enforcement. Without such enforcement the act will work more toward demoralization than toward benefit to the industry. It is, therefore, hoped that enforcement will be thorough and complete.

Mr. Miller also testified at the hearing on the 35-cent recommendation that—

> The importance of compliance and enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act can scarcely be overemphasized. The report of the committee appointed by N. R. A. to make a comprehensive survey of the boot and shoe manufacturing industry * * * clearly showed that the weakest link under N. R. A. was compliance and enforcement.

Thus by adequate enforcement the evils which exist in the industry may be dissipated and the advantages of a higher minimum wage may be fully realized.

I speak in this instance only of the boot and shoe industry. We all know that the textile industry, for instance, wants complete and thorough enforcement. We in Massachusetts who were pioneers in better labor laws know only too well the hardships caused by laws that are not uniform. I am going to refer again to the Bata Shoe Co. at Belcamp, Md., which has been operating in flagrant violation of the laws of this country. I think it shows more than anything else the need for a complete and thorough inspection.

Proof of the necessity of an adequate inspection force backed up by lawyers to complete the necessary court action is nowhere found better than in the shoe industry. Despite 23 cases—16 criminal indictments and 7 civil suits in the shoe industry—violations continue. Practically all of the cases were in New England—one was in Chicago and another in Georgia.

Only this month the Wage and Hour Division had to refer to the Department of Justice the violations of the Bata Shoe Co. at Belcamp, Md. This firm had already been forced to make restitution of $7,000 on account of its violations of the law in its warehouse in Chicago. This case only serves to focus attention on the need for continued and vigorous inspection.

Fines imposed by Federal judges against violating shoe companies alone have totaled more than $50,000, and restitution payments have passed $20,000. All of these complaints were for payment of less than the 25-cent-an-hour minimum wage, or the 30-cent wage now effective.

Now, with the issuance of the 35-cent-an-hour wage order in the shoe industry, based on the unanimous recommendation of the Shoe Industry Committee, the need for inspectors and lawyers to back up their work is greatly increased.

The shoe manufacturing industry is a highly competitive industry. The machinery and equipment used in shoemaking is for the most part owned by one independent shoe-machinery corporation and leased to manufacturers on relatively uniform terms. This makes it possible to start a shoe factory with a small amount of capital, and results in a large number of small plants, and in sharp competition. This competition is further sharpened by the fact that the manufacturer, in order to reach the market at the particular retail price levels which prevail, is confronted with a definite limitation of his cost allocation. Accordingly, among certain manufacturers, labor has become the commodity which permits them to compete advantageously over more scrupulous manufacturers.

By increasing the general wage level of the industry labor ceases to be a mere commodity only if uniform enforcement can be achieved. If a certain group of manufacturers persist in ignoring the minimum wage established just as they have in the past ignored the living-wage requirements of their employees, those manufacturers who voluntarily comply with the 35-cent minimum established by the administrator for the shoe manufacturing and allied industries will suffer an increased disadvantage and hardship.

The New England manufacturers, in particular, have recognized that business conditions will be improved by establishing and enforcing the new 35-cent minimum. The number of wage earners in New England receiving under 35 cents who are employed in boot and shoe manufacturing establishments are 21,079; in the Middle Atlantic States, 10,818; in the western States, 19,150; and in the southern States, 4,828. Despite this fact the New England manufacturers were almost unanimous in requesting that a 35-cent minimum be established and universally enforced.

Typical of the opinions of the New England manufacturers who testified at the hearing on the recommendation of the industry committee for the shoe manufacturing and allied industries in December 1939, was Mr. D. H. Hillard, manager of the shoe manufacturers' board of trade, of Haverhill, Mass., who testified that approximately 47 firms have left the Haverhill region since 1934, in order to establish their plants in lower-wage areas. He believed that a 35-cent minimum would tend to discourage migration and stabilize the industry, but that strict, adequate, and impartial enforcement of the recommended minimum are the primary objectives which will result in equitable and competitive channels of trade.

The National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association, which opposed establishment of the 35-cent minimum, also recognized the necessity for uniform enforcement. At the same hearing, Miss Ruth S. Freeman, secretary of the association, testified that—

> Enforcement of the act should also be sufficiently simple so that a minimum wage rate can be maintained in the industry, without unnecessary opposition and expense, and without unduly upsetting the complicated and highly competitive price structure in the industry.
> It is the sincere desire of a vast majority of the industry that maximum hours and minimum-wage standards be maintained; and while there are exceptions, we hold no brief for them. The National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association does not wish a minimum-wage rate applied to our industry in a way that might greatly handicap compliance and enforcement, so that the clever chiselers can cut corners and the honest manufacturers continue to suffer from this type of competition.

Members of the House are just as anxious as I am to see that the laws which are on our statute books are enforced, especially laws which will help workers to have a living wage. The amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey is to increase the amount by $140,000, or to the amount recommended by the Budget. This is really a very small sum of money, and I feel it will do an enormous amount of good. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I am for the Norton amendment. This business of cutting appropriations, which causes men and women to lose their jobs, is, in my opinion, "bughouse" economy. I cannot see where it is economy to cut appropriations and cause people to lose their positions. What are we Members of Congress going to do for these people? It has often been said that the Communists, Fascists, and Nazis are trying to undermine our Government. May I say again, as I have said many times, our Government will never be undermined by any outside power. If it is undermined, it will be by the citizens of this country because they cannot obtain employment which is necessary to provide themselves with the necessities of life. We Members of Congress are responsible for the millions of people who are out of work. We are responsible for the terrible condition that exists in our country today. It is time for us to wake up and do a little more for our fellow men. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the Members of the Committee understand the situation. The travel-expense item we are now considering is related to the salaries item of the Wage and Hour Division; in other words, there is no need of putting in the bill $140,000 for the travel-expense item unless you intend when you reach the salaries item to restore the full number of personnel which has been estimated for the next fiscal year. Therefore, if you desire to restore not only these two items but also certain other related items, the ones for printing and binding and for miscellaneous expenses, you should vote in favor of this amendment, so that when those items are reached you may also vote to restore the full amount of the Budget estimate on the items in question. However, unless you intend to restore those items also, it would not be worth while to vote to restore this particular $140,000.

Let me review briefly the history of this appropriation for the last 2 or 3 years since it was originally begun. In 1938 the Congress appropriated $400,000, $50,000 of which was assigned to the Children's Bureau for the enforcement of the child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, leaving to the Wage and Hour Division $350,000, which it was thought would be enough for the remainder of the fiscal year 1939 after October 24, 1938, when the law became effective. But it was not. The Wage and Hour Division came in when Congress reconvened and asked for $950,000 more and Congress gave them $850,000 more, making a total of $1,200,000 for that fiscal year.

For the fiscal year 1940 Congress raised the amount to approximately four-million-three-hundred-thousand-odd dollars, and the Division has not been able to use all of that to employ employees who are authorized for employment for the present fiscal year. Notwithstanding this, they come in now and ask for an increase of $3,169,000 over the appropriation of last year, to seven-million-four-hundred-thousand-odd dollars, and your committee has not cut them by the major portion of that increase, even. The amount of the reduction made still leaves them with an increase of $1,644,000 over the appropriation for the present fiscal year.

We talk about economy but of course we would never effect economies if nobody voted for economy, except when it affects an organization or activity in which he is not interested. If we are to have an effective economy there must be a reasonable paring of expenses where it can be done and not affect the usefulness of any organization and so as not to impair its operating efficiently, but unless the House is willing to give consideration to the judgment of men who have studied the question sympathetically and who have arrived at the conclusion that some economies may be effected here and there without impairing the effectiveness of an organization, then it does not seem to me there is very much hope that any considerable economies in these governmental agencies will ever be effected.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not a fact that if the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey is defeated it will still leave $260,000 for travel expenses over and above what the division has for the current year?

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Is it not true that when the Wage and Hour Division appeared before the subcommittee in July of 1939 to ask for additional sums in the deficiency bill the statement was made and apparently was understood on both sides that the rate of expenditure at the beginning of the fiscal year 1941 would be annually $7,716,000, which is the amount the gentlewoman from New Jersey wants to put back in the bill, together with my amendment?

Mr. TARVER. I may say that I am not a member of the Deficiency Committee. The Wage and Hour Administration officials may have contemplated such a rate of expenditure, but I am very sure the Committee on Appropriations did not contemplate that the rate of expenditure would increase at that speed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mrs. NORTON) there were—ayes 58, noes 100.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mrs. NORTON and Mr. HOUSTON.

The Committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 78, noes 126.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Office of Commissioner: Departmental salaries: For the Commissioner and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $570,500.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to see the Members of the House practice economy by taking it out of the hides of labor. The fight for labor has been a long and arduous one. Its opponents have been cruel and stubborn. I dislike to see the committee practically legislate in this appropriation bill. I wish to pay the committee this compliment, however, that it has no doubt given sincere and serious consideration to all the matters covered in the bill, and no doubt it is moved by the highest of motives in attempting to curtail the expenditures of the Government, which we all admit is necessary. Its Members must stand between the extremists both ways and ordinarily I go along with our committee, but I cannot in this instance. We are striking at the wrong angles, the wrong features, and the wrong factors in trying to curtail expenditures at the cost of the laboring people of this country and at the cost of the youth of America, as contemplated in this bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN] really in a few words expressed it.

I have in my hand some communications from Montana just now received by me. Let me read this one:

Slash in appropriations to Wage and Hour Act and N. L. R. B. as proposed will make acts as near inoperative as reactionaries would wish. Labor, which is the largest group of citizens, seems to be picked out for slaughter. Urge you to fight against this move.

This comes from the operating engineers' union.

Another telegram comes from the Mill and Smeltermen's Union of Great Falls, one of the most conservative unions in the United States:

Urge that you fight against slashing of appropriation to wage and hour bill and N. L. R. B. This is serious situation for labor. The effect will be felt by largest group of citizens in this country.

From the Hotel and Restaurant Employees Local No. 101, of Great Falls, comes this telegram:

We are strongly opposed to proposed cuts in Wage Hour Act and N. L. R. B. We ask your support in maintaining the standards we now have.

This one is from the Montana State Industrial Union:

Proposed slash of appropriation to Wage and Hour Act and N. L. R. B. is worst type of reaction so far indulged in. We know you will fight against it.

With all these statements I heartily agree.

This telegram comes from the Butte Miners' Union, the largest mining organization in the world, operating in the largest copper-producing mines in the world at Butte, Mont.:

Urge that you do all you can and support the full appropriation of $3,180,000 for the National Labor Relations Board, which comes to a vote Tuesday.

BUTTE MINERS' UNION, No. 1,
PAUL FALL, Jr.,
Recording Secretary.

I have received also the following telegrams from other mining organizations:

Appropriation slash to Wage-Hour Act and N. L. R. B. is definitely underhanded attack on labor. Hope you will fight against this proposition.

WALTER NORUM,
United Mine Workers of America, Local 2301, Stockett, Mont.

We would appreciate if you would demand appropriation of $3,180,000 for N. L. R. B. This appropriation has been cut by House committee.

ANACONDA (MONT.) MILL AND SMELTERMEN'S UNION, No. 117.

This organization appreciate your doing what you can to block proposed cuts in appropriations N. L. R. B. and Wage-Hour Administration, underhanded moves to take from labor gains and security it has fairly won during Roosevelt administration.

A. H. RAYMOND,
President, Great Falls Newspaper Guild.

Slash in appropriations to Wage and Hour Act and N. L. R. B., as proposed, will make acts as near inoperative as reactionaries would wish. Labor, which is the largest group of citizens, seems to be picked out for slaughter. Urge you to fight against this move.

CASCADE COUNTY TRADES & LABOR ASSEMBLY,
A. V. BIALLAS, Secretary.

All of these unions are composed of fine, upstanding, industrious citizens who are a credit to the Nation and themselves. They are pleading with you not to destroy labor by taking a step that will ultimately destroy years of progress in behalf of labor's cause.

Labor is back of the National Labor Relations Board. Labor is opposed to being made the goat by this House or by this Congress in its attempt to economize. Labor is opposed to taking economy out of the hides of the poor and defenseless people of this country. If we are going to economize, Mr. Chairman, let us not economize in favor of the great and big industries of this country and at the expense of the working people of the country. Labor is really the backbone of the country. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, field service: For salaries of field personnel of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, including the personnel of the Immigration Border Patrol and the services of persons authorized by law to be detailed to the District of Columbia for duty, $7,953,600: Provided, That not to exceed $36,000 of the total amount herein appropriated shall be available for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (5 U. S. C. 118a), not to exceed $1,700 for any person: Provided further, That $130,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available only for the payment of extra compensation for overtime services of inspectors and employees of the Immigration and Naturalization Service for which the United States receives reimbursement in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 2, 1931 (8 U. S. C. 109a–109b): Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the compensation of assistants to clerks of United States courts: Provided further, That notwithstanding the provisions of the act of February 5, 1917 (8 U. S. C. 109), authorizing the Secretary of Labor to draw annually from the appropriations for the enforcement of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States, $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enforce the law excluding contract laborers and induced and assisted immigrants, not to exceed $40,000 of the sum herein appropriated may be expended for such purposes, and such expenditure shall be made in strict compliance with the provisions of the act of July 11, 1919 (18 U. S. C. 201).

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKSTEIN: On page 7, line 9, after the word "duty", strike out "$7,953,600" and insert "$8,133,420."

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 3 additional minutes to discuss this amendment, which I believe is a very important one.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask Members on both sides of the aisle to give me their attention and their help so that we may work together on something that is for the best interests of this country. I do not wish to attempt to criticize the members of the Appropriations Committee on both sides of the aisle. I believe that they would be in support of this amendment if they were permitted freely to do so, but because of the Budget agitation they have cut the appropriation to enforce the immigration laws. If you want to cripple the enforcement of the law, you are going to succeed in doing it by cutting a few dollars out of this appropriation on the plea of economy.

I may say at the outset that we have the Veterans of Foreign Wars and other organizations of patriotic Americans opposed to cutting this appropriation which would reduce the staff of immigration inspectors.

I may say to this Committee that the immigration inspector of this country is the first line of defense, if there is any line of defense at all.

Now, what does the bill propose to do? It proposes to cut out 37 immigration inspectors who are the arm of the law in the enforcement of the immigration laws and the deportation of undesirable aliens. I sat in this House when certain Members on both sides of the aisle quarreled with the Department of Labor because it was not enforcing the law; yet, in the face of that statement and the charges that were made on this floor, you now seek to reduce their force by 37 immigration inspectors, 27 clerks, and 8 other persons—all of whom are absolutely necessary in preventing smuggling of aliens into this country and in checking up on undesirable aliens who are in the country.

Now, what are you going to save by this economy? You are going to save $179,820 at the expense of whom? At the expense of the American people generally and these men who will be removed from the service because of the lack of these few, paltry dollars; and you are going to allow a lot of people to roam around in this country who would otherwise be picked up by these men, who would also get them out of the country.

I do not pretend to be a restrictionist. I have always appeared on this flood appealing for humanity and asking you not to separate families of American people. I come here on the floor once in a while appealing to you to pass a certain bill which affects a family group in this country, but I am an honest restrictionist. I believe in enforcing the law in order that we may rid this country of dope peddlers and smugglers and men who would be guilty of espionage, as well as other persons who are undesirable. You are now reversing your own position by saying that we are not going to enforce the law; that we are going to take almost 45 men from the enforcement arm of the Service in order to save $179,000.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. In regard to the amount of work necessary to protect our border, this statement I have from a man on the border. He said he picked up a man who entered the country illegally, but the man claimed that he had been born in the country. Later, when he fingerprinted him, he found he had a jail record. This is just one instance. However, the officer who picked him up had to take him on the charge of riding illegally on a freight train in order to get this evidence on him.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is what we are talking about. By removing these inspectors you are trying to weaken the enforcement of the immigration law, and I know that this Congress will not stand for it.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that a representative of the Department of Labor appeared before our committee and stated that many of the ports of entry to the United States are manned only 8 hours out of the 24?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is correct.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And if they remove these inspectors, they further remove the guards from our borders?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is correct. There are 9,000 miles of border, the Texas, the Mexican, and the Canadian border, and we have only 220 men guarding that border.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does this not also effect the naturalization service?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; because a member of the border patrol can be deputized as an inspector. You are just removing the arm of the law, the first arm of defense, in respect to undesirable aliens, and I appeal to Members on both sides of the aisle to restore this $179,000. You are not helping your people when you allow such a reduction as that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly the gentleman does not wish the Members to assume from his statement that there is any reduction made in the border patrol?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; you have restored that, but I am pointing out to the gentleman that a man who is a member of the border patrol can be taken off that board and made an immigration inspector, and in that way the border will not be properly protected; and it needs more men instead of less men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would not the gentleman assume at the same time that the department heads would be discriminating enough to take people away from places where they are not needed?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not want anybody taken from where they are needed. I want the enforcement of the immigration law that you men have been preaching about, and with regard to which you have been criticizing Miss Perkins and other members of the immigration staff who are trying to do an honest job. You are now removing by the reduction of $179,000, 37, 28, and 8 persons in different divisions from the immigration service, and if I had something to say about it I would increase the number employed to 500, to make sure that this law is enforced in regard to smuggling, espionage, and the entry of undesirable persons who are coming in here. I appeal to you on both sides of the aisle, do not remove this little sum of money, which will help to enforce the law. I say also that during the last 5 or 6 years 28 men on the border patrol were killed by a group of smugglers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Is it the gentleman's intention in making the statement that he has made, and he has made a splendid exposition of this subject, to charge the committee with cutting the appropriation which the Budget provided?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Oh, no.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman understands, and I wish the gentleman would tell the House, that the subcommittee has given the budgetary estimate, and if any cut was made in this it was made by the Budget and not the committee.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. At the outset I complimented the committee upon its work, and at the same time stated that it was not the fault of the subcommittee, that they were willing almost from the reading of the record, to restore this cut. I have read the gentleman's inquiry and Mr. TARVER's inquiry and the inquiry of the other gentlemen, but the Bureau of the Budget does not know much about aliens. They are dealing with dollars and cents. We know something about what is going on. I say to you, with the number of ships that are coming in during the year and the number of seamen that are being smuggled in, you are destroying something which we need as a first arm of defense to prevent persons coming in here who do not belong in this country.

Mr. KEEFE. May I suggest that the gentleman call attention to the fact that the committee refused to permit the item of administrative promotions, which was requested by this department. They intended to grant administrative promotions and get the money by discharging some of their present help, and we refused to permit them to do it.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am grateful to the committee for using its judgment; but I still submit to the committee that in their hearts and souls they want to enforce the law. I have heard so many speeches made here that I believe we all want to enforce the law, and the only way to do it is to give us back this money. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I think the interrogatories of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] have somewhat clarified this matter. The committee not only made no reduction in the Budget estimates for personnel for the Immigration and Naturalization Service, but it took approximately $128,000 which had been placed in the estimates by the Bureau of the Budget for administrative promotions, and used that money to provide for 46 border patrolmen in addition to those which had been estimated for by the Budget, bringing the border patrol back to its present strength for the next fiscal year, and to provide for 13 additional field immigration inspectors in addition to those which had been estimated for by the Budget. So that the committee has not only not cut the Budget, but it has gone over the Budget in effect, in making provision for these increases.

If you will examine the report of the committee I think you will find an equally strong statement to that which has been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] as to the necessity for continuing this service unimpaired. However, the gentleman is in error when he intimates that the Department officials are asking for more money in order to enable them to carry out their duties, and that their request is being denied. They are being given more money, in effect, than they asked for.

Let me direct your attention to the testimony of Mr. Houghteling, Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, on page 194 of the hearings, in response to questions asked by me:

Mr. TARVER. Then your field inspection service would be injured by reducing the number by 90, as you indicate is proposed, in order to make these administrative promotions?

Mr. HOUGHTELING. We can take care of our present business with a somewhat smaller force on account of certain economies which we are putting into effect in our method of handling cases. There are a great number of cases, for instance, in which the admission of an alien should properly be authorized at the port of entry, because he has a valid visa, but there is some technical flaw in his right to enter. Under the old system our Board of Special Inquiry at the port of entry used such flaws as a basis for excluding the alien and passing the whole problem to Washington on the alien's appeal, holding him in detention in the meantime at the expense of the Government and doubling the amount of work involved, instead of settling the case on its merits in the first place. Then the Board of Review at the central office reconsiders the case and very often admits the alien. This is one of many examples of ways in which we are improving our procedure and by better methods hope to get along with a smaller staff.

Mr. TARVER. Then why not save that money and leave it out of the bill, and not provide it for the purpose of administrative promotions of other employees? This is a time when we ought to effect economies, if we can. It is not economy merely to cut off some employees in order to add their salaries to the salaries of some other employees. If we want economy and if that is what we are driving at—and I hope it is—then we ought to cut out the money for the salaries of these 90 inspectors and not leave it in the bill as an addition to the salaries of other employees.

Mr. HOUGHTELING. I agree with you most wholeheartedly. The idea of making promotions at a time when we are trying to economize does not seem to me to be logical.

So this bill as it has been brought to you provides for more money for this border patrol service and field immigration service than the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization himself said was necessary. We cannot be accused of failing to provide these administrative officials with the money which they need in order to properly enforce the law.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] made a very frank statement, that they tried to economize by removing some inspectors for the purpose of increasing some higher-bracket salaries, and the committee has cut that out. I commend you for it. You have restored the border patrol, but have you not by your action removed 37 immigration inspectors, men trained in the service of picking up aliens, and 27 clerks, by cutting out this $179,000?

Mr. TARVER. On the contrary, we have insured the continuance of 46 border patrolmen and 13 field inspectors, who, according to the Budget estimates, would have been dropped, and we have provided Mr. Houghteling with more employees than he said he needed.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; you provided more enforcement on the border patrol, but not internally.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DICKSTEIN) there were ayes 39 and noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses, maternal and child welfare: For all authorized and necessary administrative expenses of the Children's Bureau in performing the duties imposed upon it by title V of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, as amended, including personal services, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; supplies; services; equipment; newspapers, books of reference, periodicals, and press clippings, $364,000.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the Chairman of the Committee if the item "Maternal and child welfare" and the following item "Grants to States for maternal- and child-health service" are applicable to Puerto Rico?

Mr. TARVER. They are.

The Clerk read down to and including line 12 on page 14.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.
